PETTICOATS IN OFFICE.

worthiness to the general standard of the government clerk.

It has frequently been stated by public men that, as a substantial proposition, it was a grave mistake to have originally employed ladies as clerks. The practice was inaugurated under Secretary Chase's administration of the treasury department, and has grown therefrom to such proportions that it can never be changed by anything less than revolution. It is not new to the history of the world that female influence should exert paramount power, and although grave abuses have crept and must hereafter creep into the system of female employments in the several departments, yet the extent of such influences and volume of their power are constantly increasing.

departments are in accord with each other and get along together smoothly. As a general rule, considering the peculiar and acknowledged weaknesses of the sex, they appear to harmonize much better than would be generally supposed. They do not relish, however, being governed by female dominion, much preferring to serve under a division chief to the opposite sex. It is noticeable that whenever a lady clork is placed as superior over them, they are dsposed to rebel against her authority, and, of course, the female chief or head is much less sympathetic to her own sex—this, because of the fact that women appear to each other in a very different light than they appear to men.

Of course jealousies and bickerings frequently ensue, and with their concomitants of revenges and recoupements, in which their associate male clerks are forced to take sides to a greater or lesses extent. These disturbances sometimes involve senators, members and high officials, since each must uphold the cause of his lady appointee or else be recalcitrants to his section, his predictions, or his interest in her behalt. It may be heartless, perhaps, but when a senator or member seeks a clerical position for a lady he is not particular what other lady is dismissed to great an extent, now-a-days, perhaps, upon the character of the female clerks, not to so great an extent, now-a-days, perhaps, in the contract of the female clerks, not to so great an extent, now-a-days, perhaps, in the contract of the female clerks, not to so great an extent, now-a-days, perhaps.
