LILLY DALE.

*Twas a calm still night,
And the moon's pale light
Shone soft o'er had and vale,
When fliends, mute with gnet,
Stood around the death-hed
Of my poor lost Liky Date.
Oh! Litte, sweet Liky, dear Lilly Date,
Now the wild rose biossonis
Oper her lattle green grave.
Neath the trees in the flow'ry vale

Twas a calm still night.

Her chicks that once glowed With the rose that of health,
By the hand of disease had tuined pale;
And the death-lamp was on
The pure white brow
Of my poor lost Lilly Date.
Oh! Lilly, &c.

"I go," she said.
"To the land of rest,
And ere my strength shall fail
I must tell you where. You must lay poor Lilly Dale.
Oh! Lilly, &c.

Where the wall flowers grow,

And the aream upples forth thro' the rale,

Where the burse shall warnle Their songs in spring.
There isy poor Lilly Dale.

Oh! Lilly, &c.

forgotten, but for the scene which presented itself on my coming into the cabin. The stove was surrounded by persons who were busy drying cloaks and other garments. Another group were conduling with a lady who was reclining in a large rocking chair, hooking very pale and sid. She had a loose wrapper thrown about her, and her whole appearance indicated that she thrown about her, and her whole appearance indicated that she had escaped from danger, not without a plunge in the water.

Before I had time to inquire concerning the circumstances, a 'ady who had followed me from the dock exclaimed, "Only think of he' he w providential! This lady," pointing to me, "came ever with a child in her aims; and it the plank had shipped with her instead of you, either she or the child must have been lost. You cannot think how finglifered the passengers were when they saw her coming."

"Providential, indeed!" said the almost exhausted one, for the "Frostdentia", indeed? said the atmost exhausted one, for the first time raising her eyes. "Had not both my hands been at therty, a that I could seize held of the plank which fell under me, I must have been lost. She would have elasped her babe—but," she added after a short pause, "abe would have had the satisfaction of dying much her child," and she drew a heavy . sigh.

I toon saw that something weighed heavily on the mind of the क्रीमें दरत्ते afflicted woman. She listened with an indifference almost amounting to incivility, were it not for her subdued and sorrowful expression, to the congratuations of people, who occasionally amounting to incirally, were it not for her anbidged and sorrow-ful expression, to the congratulations of people, who occasionally is sed into the cabin, to see the lady who fell overboard, and to enquire how sie found herself. And the spotling of a very nice cross, lame. I wish voluble expressions of sorrow, gave her to concern. Sie did not seem to prize very highly the life which had thus been preserved, although she said that she had been several times rescued from death in a very remarkable manner. DIADUCT.

Neither of us having any attraction toward the gay company Arther of its nating any attraction toward the gay company above, the lady and myself remained together in the cabin. As soon as "re were left alone, I could not resist a desire in know the cause of her deep melancholy. She told me she had low her only clind, and not by death. Alas I death would have been a blessing to that poor weeping mother; for her child was savies away from her; and she knew not what dreadful fate might have hatelless has betalien her.

About a year after this, I was in New York, when, one fi summer afternoon, I joined a party of friends for a walk or battery. I was in a rather abstracted mood, and did not much what was going on around me, when suddenly I was called to consciousness by hearing a very aweet voice say, "I mamma! why do you stare so at that hed?"

I raised my even, and most three of the around.

mamma! why do you stare so at that ma?

I raised my eyes, and met those of the questioner. She was a lovely child of some ten summers; but though as it appeared she was a perfect stranger, there was something in her look the enchained—not to say enchanted me—I glanced at the ledy whe was her companion. In a moment I recognised Mrs. Allen was her companion. In a moment i recognises was her companion. In a moment i recognises we have her with each other's arms. I comprehended at axes him blest she was; for the dark-eyed, gypacy-looking child could be no other than the long mourned Nelly. The first words Mrs. Allen could speak, were, "O, you were a true prophet. God did not be not been appropriated to the prophet. The first words meaning the prophet. But you must need to be not you must need to be not be not been a prophet. Allen could speak, were, "O, you were a true property indeed, work mysteriously, as you shall hear. But you a come home with us. I cannot yet speak of my happiness we out more emotion than is proper to be shown in sech a place this. But come here, Nelly. This is the lady who was so to me, and whose parting words gave me so much comfort." embraced the sweet child; and then it was arranged, as I just the lady who was so in the lady wh
