

The people in Boston treated Jewitt kindly, and he wrote a very entertaining book, giving an account of his adventures.

After this, he settled in the town of Berlin, in Connecticut, where he pursued for several years the trade of a blacksmith. He was a very honest, pious man, and obtained the good will and good opinion of all who knew him. He died about ten years ago.

