Reminiscences of a Man Closely Con-nected With Railroad History. The death of the veteran railroader, Mr. Joseph Whitehead, of Clinton, Ont., on Monday, removes from this sphere one of the most noted men in the history of railroading. He was aged 82. The most interesting parts of Mr. Whitehead's railroading reminiscences were those connected with the beginning of railroading in England under George Stephenson. Mr. Whitehead began life when he was ten years of age as a driver on the coal tramways near Darlington. The occa-sion of the building of the road from Darlington to Stockton was to get cheap means of transport for coal to the seaboard. This line was 25 miles long, and was built by Quaker mine owners headed by Edward Pease, a celebrity of the time, in the place of a canal they con-templated building. Stephenson talked them over to the idea of a railroad, and then a struggle began that lasted for several years before a charter could be secured. The road was opposed by all classes of people. Laborers though that it would throw everybody out of work; the landed proprietors objected because it would ruin their fox covers. Farmers thought it would burn their stacks and farms, and preachers talked against it from the pulpit because it mocked God by bringing places nearer together than He ever intended they should be. On this account much of Stephenson's preliminary surveying had to be done by moonlight. When the charter was finally granted the roadbed was constructed on a somewhat different plan from that pur-sued at present. The rails were laid on two foot blocks of wood and were kept from spreading solely by the weight of the ballast. The first engine constructed was the "Locomotion," which weighed about twelve tons and had but four wheels. The water tank was made out of a hogshead. On this engine the erst-while driver of the tram became the first fireman.
