

Tainted God.

BY MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON. Author of "The Barn Stormers," "Fortune's Sport," "Lady Mary of the Dark House," "Queen Beatrix," "The House by the Lake," etc.

CHAPTER XXXIX.—(Continued.) Still holding her hand so tightly that she could not wrench it away, Macaire led her further into the room, nearer to the group of men whom women who had stopped their conversation to listen and look at the new comer.

The men were already on their feet, but the women remained seated. Four or five painted faces under hair bleached golden or dyed to the sheen of copper stared up at her with bold, laughing eyes. Winifred shrank back with a horrified catching of her breath. She was an innocent who had no knowledge of the world until she began to earn her living on the stage, but instinct rather than knowledge told her with one blinding flash of enlightenment what these women were whom Lionel Macaire had asked her to meet.

Some of the men she had seen before, though not to one had she ever spoken. There was a Frenchman with royal blood in his veins, there was a young English earl who had lately been made bankrupt; there was a man better known on the race course than in drawing-rooms.

A word from Macaire to the Frenchman brought him to be introduced to "the Miss Gray of whom he had so often heard." He bowed with a broad complacency, and looked at Winifred with a smile. "Why don't you get up, no man had ever looked at her before."

"Dinner is served," announced a footman. Macaire pulled Winifred's resisting hand under his arm, and held her close to his side as he walked by his side across the room. The girl was deadly pale, but she did not cry out, as Macaire's watchful eyes told that he half expected her to do.

They reached the marble dining-room, with its purple hangings, its pink granite pillars and blue-wooded ceiling. Winifred's place was by Macaire's side, and she sank into the chair which a footman offered her. "Now drink, my dear," said Macaire, "and you will see that she had not kept to the bargain. Having gone through so much, she must endure to the end, or she might better never have come to this horrible house. She could only hope that she knew the worst now. And perhaps, she told herself, even this was better than to have been forced by her promise to dine with Macaire alone."

"I do not wish to," she answered in a low tone, "in the babel of hilarious voices." "You shall not consider that you have kept your word. To dine with a man is not merely to sit at his table, but to eat his food and drink his wine. You can't bring yourself to do that, can you?"

Winifred made a faint protesting sound, but Macaire, knowing what she ate, said that it was better. "Now drink, my dear," he insisted, "or you know the consequences. Surely it isn't much to me to touch the wine that comes from my cellar."

Champagne, in a jewelled Venetian glass, was sending up to his depths to the golden gleaming surface a stream of bubbles. Winifred raised her glass to her lips and drank. As she did so her tortured eyes met Macaire's, and the light of satisfaction that had darted from his, though he would have hidden it, startled her. She set down the glass quickly. What had that look meant? Was he pleased that she had drunk his wine because of his triumph in compelling her obedience, or was there a more subtle reason?

Her heart knocked against her side, and her hands grew cold as her gaze travelled questioningly from one hard face to another. Was there one in this strange company who would sympathize or help her if she went down in her knees to implore it? She did not believe that there was one. And Baron von Zellheim did not come.

Fearful lest she had made a serious mistake, she watched her own feelings. Had she experienced any different sensations, she asked herself, anxiously, since she had drunk those few sips of wine?

At first she hoped that her excited fancy alone conjured up the imagined difference, but slowly she was obliged to acknowledge that she felt a slight giddiness, a weakness of the limbs of which she had never known anything before. Her eyelids drooped, and she lifted them with an effort. There was a faint prickling in the palms of her hands and the soles of her feet. The beating of her heart, which had been like the wild fluttering of a bird against the bars of a cage, slowed to a heavy, measured throbbing at longer intervals. The shrill laughter of the women at the table sounded metallic, unreal and far away. A mist rose between her and the faces to which a few minutes ago she had turned a vainly appealing gaze.

Get the Doctor Quick!

Winifred's eyes were fixed on the man who had asked her to meet. "The money you've saved out of what I fung to you wouldn't have bought it."

"The ruined castle has been the property of my family for many years, though I have been absent and too poor to restore it. That has been my privilege."

"Pshaw!" laughed Macaire, hatefully. "These friends will know how much to believe of that, and what to do with it. For six months you've worked hard to make it worth living. He had shed blood to make it worth living, and he did not mean that Nemesis should strike him from being a millionaire."

"The millionnaire had not a house nor a room of his in one of his houses where all electric lights could not be turned off by means of a single button. His steam yacht, waiting his orders in harbor, was always ready to start at ten minutes' notice. Once he would have had to depend upon horses for a dash to the sea, but now he had the means by which he could outdistance the fastest horse on earth."

"In his stables stood a racing Dalmier auto-car, fitted with horse-power, though the man who was in charge of it was seated by his engineer for an instant start, filled with petrol and water, its machinery oiled."

"To-night, as he switched off the light of the dining-room, he flung himself at a swinging door which he opened, and through a passage leading to the huge kitchens, the door moved mysteriously, and Macaire's artificial foot limped with which the floor was covered faster than it had ever done before."

"Half-way down the passage was a door which opened near the stables. A moment later the motor car was in the yard, and the driver was on his feet. Macaire sprang to the car and lit the cigarette which he had in his mouth. He was working for life or death."

"True, Hope Newcome might have led; he might suspect, yet not have the means to do so. He would not do to risk his having led, if it would not reach Gravesend, where the Diavola lay (he hoped that she knew she was there), before the police could get to the scene of the crime. He had a chance for him still. He would trust the yacht to show her heels to anything afloat. The seas were wide, and there were no countries where he could hide himself, and the Diavola, with its board of pounds' worth of diamonds which he kept there in a safe in case of such necessity as had arisen to-night, yet he would want for nothing, and he would at least have defied the hangman."

"In two minutes the car was ready to start, the stable doors flung open. By this time the Diavola was in the street, groping in the dark would be light again. The police would be in if the dead man's son had told the truth—but they were not here yet."

"He ran limping from the opening doors back to the car and climbed on to the seat. Then, with a rushing and a banging of its machinery, the Dalmier tore into the street."

"Let them come now if they could. What did he care? Who could catch him now? What was there fast about the following car far away as to guess at his destination?"

"Out in the street he put on the fastest speed, recking nothing of the law, for none could stop him. With its two electric lamps like great white dragon eyes blazing in the night, the Dalmier tore through the streets at the rate of thirty miles an hour. People flung themselves wildly out of the way, shrieking for the police, shouting that there was a madman, that he was rushing through their snorting horses up side streets to avoid destruction or drove in desperation on to the pavement, the wheels of their vehicles here and there going high treble of crashing glass to the uproar."

"Policemen yelled to the hatless man bent forward over the steering gear, bidding him stop on pain of desperate penalties, but Macaire only laughed. Rain had begun to fall, and the wind and the water, spraying against his hot face, cooled his brain, giving him a sense of power and exhilaration. He felt his Jugernaut and longed for victims for the wheels of his rushing car, which flew faster than the flying minutes, bearing him out of danger to a new life."

"You dog, you common cur that I took from the gutter!" shrieked Macaire. "You puppet that I hired with my money to dance at my bidding! You thought you might presume on your brute strength to come here and insult me in my own house, I suppose, since our contract wasn't out yet. But it's got hardly a month more to run."

"I'll call it cancelled now," said Hope Newcome. "You and I will have no more contracts in future."

"Everyone here shall know who you are," Macaire went on, "and in the world that I've been laughing at shall know to-morrow, and where will you be then? Why, kicked back to your kennel by the women who've made you dear pet."

"My kennel," rather a nice one," said Newcome, "Schloss Zellheim, on the Rhine. It is no longer a ruin. I have had it restored in these last few weeks. I hope to take Miss Gray with me. My friends will tell you the Baroness von Zellheim, and any man who has told lies about her will have been horse-whipped into public apology."

"The money you've saved out of what I fung to you wouldn't have bought it."

The City Markets

The city markets this week remain practically the same as they were during last week. In a few instances there has been a temporary cut in a few lines which were essentially holiday goods. The regular prices, however, remain the same as before. The retail prices are as follows:

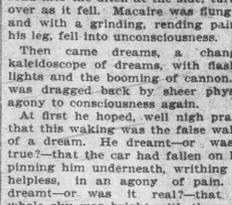

Table listing various market goods and their prices, including items like Flour, Sugar, and various meats.

WHOLESALE MARKETS

WHEN KILLING IS DUTY TO

Philadelphia, Pa., J. Elliott Norton, of Canada, and with Ingham Booth in the hopelessly diseased accident, his views on a letter written to M. public here to-day.

Dr. Norton was a student of literature at Harvard University, and with them made the title of "Divine Comedy as compassion," and Hall, and writes: "The principle of prolong every human life possible at whatever port has been the sacredness of human and the practice have led to there is every human life as and to be preserved what results to the others, the present cases to which ever consideration urges that be put. Setting as cases no right thing sufficient to end the together, to the victim from the torturing recovery was impossible, and the cost of prolonging life by medical operations. No reasonable man hesitates in the case of such, for example as has reached the stage of severe pain and wishes to die. The In such a case by the given notice that the Legislature for an act of the savings of the York scheme for the purpose of the Metropoli- tan Bank has paid up 1000 and a reserve of Metropolitan's capital the reserve $1,000,000.
