SEASONABLE REMINDERS

Now is the time to clean up around the yard preparatory for winter. In the garden and flower-beds, too, some work should be done. All dead plants, flowers, vines and so on should be gathered together and burned, so that they will not afford a hiding place for insects to pass the winter under.

Usually there is to be found on every farm a few roots of rhubarb, the product from which during the early summer is put to very good use in the kitchen, but there are many people doubtless who are not aware that excellent rhubarb may be used in the house in the middle of winter if a little trouble is taken in caring for the roots. The best way is to dig up a good big healthy root and leave it on top of the ground for a while. Then when winter sets in it can be brought in and stored in the cool cellar. When rhubarb is required the root can be put in a flower-pot or tub in sand near to some heat and in the course of two or three weeks a plentiful supply of rhubarb will be available for use.

Perhaps the alfalfa patch which you were so enthusiastic over in the spring has not come up to expectations. Don't be discouraged. This year has been an exceptional one for all classes of plants and just because alfalfa hasn't given good results this year is no reason why it should be branded as unsuitable for your conditions. There are so many factors which influence the success of this crop that it is unfair to judge it by one season's experiences. Once alfalfa gets a good start it is one of the most drought resistant pasture plants.

Remember, too, that to be successful, either the seed or the ground must be properly inoculated. It is quite possible that either of these treatments may have gone wrong. If inoculation took place on a very bright sunny day there is a great probability that the bacteria were killed by the sunlight.

This year probably very little difficulty has been experienced in heavy clay lands with poor drainage, but do not let the opportunity for loosening up the land pass on account of one favorable season. One of the best ways of improving the drainage in heavy clay soils is by means of plowing under barnyard manure. Spread all the manure you reasonably can over the land, not too thickly, and plow it under deep this fall. This manure shouldn't have too much straw in it because, owing to the dryness of our soils, straw and trash in the ground takes a long time to rot down and become incorporated as humus in the soil.

When manure is plowed under in large quantities the straw does not readily rot and while lying in the ground in this state breaks the connection between the soil particles by means of which the soil water rises in the ground and on this account the earth above this layer of straw rapidly dries out. Such a condition will not allow of proper plant growth and is especially bad in a dry season.

Before the cold weather sets in there are many odd jobs to be done so as to make things handy and comfortable around the farm. Perhaps after this dry weather the well has become low. Now would be a good time to clean it out and deepen it a little. Then the stable needs a few panes of glass in some of the windows. Some of the stalls need fixing up. Out boxes are missing in some places. Perhaps the floor in some of the stalls needs a little fixing. A load or two of fine gravel or sand will do wonders toward straightening up earth floors and making them clean, comfortable and easily kept clean during the winter.

Roots are not a big crop this year, but what there are of them should be handled carefully. There is nothing better than a few roots on the farm to be fed to all kinds of stock during the winter time. Roots add to the tastiness of the food which otherwise is quite dry.

Keep the plows going and harrow behind them. Even if the ground does look dry there is some moisture in it which harrowing will conserve and at any rate the better the tilth of the soil, the better will be the chance for weed seeds to germinate.
