AN INTELLECTUAL DOG.

A Story of Canine Cleverness—Finding the Way Home.

Carriage dogs are seldom good looking. I, for my part, have a dislike to their spotted appearance, but I must confess to a weakness for Spot, who is really quite one of the cleverest dogs I have ever known, and though some of the stories told of him sound altogether improbable, the truth of them can be vouched for without hesitation. Part of his life he lived in Cambridge, and as he had a great deal of spare time, he devoted this master being much impressed by his literary work, he took to paying visits to a neighboring police station and taking his exercise with members of the staff. His master knew but little of his movements, as Spot was a dog of independent habits and well able to take care of himself. On some occasions he absented himself for a few days together, but always turned up safe and sound at the end of that time, no anxiety being manifest to find him, although nobody knew what he did with himself.

Enlightenment on this point was brought home to his master in the following manner: He had been giving himself a little more relaxation of late, and Spot had been, in consequence, more with him, and less absent on his own devices. One evening, as master and dog were sitting on the sofa together, there came a knock at the door, followed by the entrance of a constable, whose errand was to Spot, having been called by the man, civilly, "I've come to ask if you can kindly spare the dog for a night."

The dog's reply was a most surprising one: "Any dog, do you mean? What do you want him for?" "We've got a new man on the beat, sir," was the answer, as if that could explain everything.

Much perplexed, the dog's master proceeded to make inquiries, and ascertained the different men accompanying the constable, and ascertained the different men accompanying the constable, and ascertained the different men accompanying the constable.
