Why are we reunited here to-day? Why are these distinguished strangers here siding with you for one thing only, that is, the welfare of the Acadian French. The advancement of our race. Perhaps it may be asked if we as Canadians, require these special efforts for our advancement? Do we really feel that in the race for education we are behind? Do we realize that our neighbors are more prosperous than we—that we are in a manner their inferiors? Yes, gentlemen, these things are patent to us, and as a skillful doctor makes a diagnosis of his case before prescribing the medicine, so we investigate the causes that keep us behind before we attempt to remove them. This, then, is why we are here. We wish to unitedly consult over the causes that retard our material progress. History tells us that our fathers, when they reached the shores of Acadia, possessed all the qualities requisite to success there. The course in danger, their patience in difficulty, their devotion and heroism in the defence of all that was dear to them, have never been questioned. Have we, then, their descendants, lost those good qualities which so distinguished them? We say no. We affirm that their virtues and their heroism are our heritage. It is not time, then, for us to take advantage of our resources and of our disposition to better our condition? We recognize our inferior position, and, moreover, we recognize a laudable ambition to emerge from it. We wish in this reunion to-day to recall the toils of our pioneer fathers in order to better appreciate their success and victories and so strengthen our hopes for the future. Their triumphs were in having passed through trial without parallel in modern history. Our glory is in having loyally preserved the faith of our ancestors and remaining faithful to their traditions and their language—the beautiful language of Jean Racine and Pierre Corneille, of Fenelon and of Bossuet. We have not forgotten! What do I say? Forgotten! It has hardly become enfeebled, though for years we have been in contact with people whose tongue and customs are foreign to its spirit. These historic facts we wish to celebrate. We wish to utilize the fraternal sentiments that exist among the Acadians, and by our reunions know each other better and cement the union that already exists. We are descendants of a little people, once conquered, dispersed and despoiled in a shameful manner. As a conquered race we became accustomed to depreciate our talents, to walk with bowed heads as it were, and to consider ourselves unable to compete by talent or merit with our more favored neighbors. We wish by this reunion to estimate our resources. Subjects as we are of a good and gracious Queen, we live in a free and privileged country, where all men aspire to the highest positions and expect the loftiest degree of social and political advancement. We wish to develop this patriotic sentiment, the dearest heritage of a Frenchman. It is by union that our influence will be felt, and we can by these means advance our social and political and industrial interests. I ask you, is not a worthy aim for us to desire to contact with people whose tongue and customs are foreign to its spirit. These historic facts we wish to celebrate. We wish to utilize the fraternal sentiments that exist among the Acadians, and by our reunions know each other better and cement the union that already exists. Subjects as we are of a good and gracious Queen, we live in a free and privileged country, where all men aspire to the highest positions and expect the loftiest degree of social and political advancement. We wish to develop this patriotic sentiment, the dearest heritage of a Frenchman. It is by union that our influence will be felt, and we can by these means advance our social and political and industrial interests. I ask you, is not a worthy aim for us to desire to contact with people whose tongue and customs are foreign to its spirit. These historic facts we wish to celebrate. We wish to utilize the fraternal sentiments that exist among the Acadians, and by our reunions know each other better and cement the union that already exists. We are descendants of a little people, once conquered, dispersed and despoiled in a shameful manner. As a conquered race we became accustomed to depreciate our talents, to walk with bowed heads as it were, and to consider ourselves unable to compete by talent or merit with our more favored neighbors. We wish by this reunion to estimate our resources.
