WEDDED AT LAST!

CHAPTER VIII.

The man appeared on the threshold of the door between the two rooms, calm and quiet as usual.

"I am here, Sir Hugh," he said, in his even voice, his keen eyes noting the disquiet on his master's haggard face.

"What the deuce are you doing in there?" demanded Sir Hugh, irritably.

"I was packing up, Sir Hugh."

"Let the packing wait—I want to be alone," said Sir Hugh, in the same impatient manner; but the man lingered.

"Can I get you anything, Sir Hugh?" he asked respectfully. "I am afraid you are ill."

"Ill! What put that into your head?" returned the baronet, as he walked over to the looking glass. But the pale haggard face he saw there startled himself, and he laughed a little bitter laugh. "By Jove, I don't wonder at your thinking so!" he said carelessly. "I am afraid Scotland, and especially Fairholme Court, does not agree with me."

"You look as if you needed a change of some kind, Sir Hugh. May I get you some brandy?"

"So you think brandy is the universal panacea?" Sir Hugh said, with another little laugh.

"I have found it very efficacious, Sir Hugh," Latrelle answered, with the same unmoved impassive countenance.

"Have you? Then bring me some, and some soda-water; or make me one of your 'pick-me-ups', if you like. That is one of your accomplishments, and you have several."

"I have knocked about the world a good deal, Sir Hugh, and I have acquired some knowledge everywhere," was the quiet answer, as the man left the room to fetch the required restorative.

When he returned, he found that Sir Hugh had thrown himself into an arm-chair and was lying back, with his eyes closed wearily. As the baronet took the glass from the man's hand and questioned, the servant's meaning and significant.

"I don't suppose you are more honest than your fellows, Latrelle," Sir Hugh said coolly.

"I don't suppose I am, Sir Hugh."

thrustastic admirer of beauty; and Major Stuart is not an Adonis.

"You speak as if you had had a college education, Latrelle," Sir Hugh remarked.

"I had good opportunities," the man replied modestly.

"Then Delphine thinks that it is very likely Miss Ross wears of her engagement."

"Mademoiselle Delphine thinks she will do so, Sir Hugh."

"And what is your opinion, most sagacious of valets?"

"I think, Sir Hugh, that before very long Miss Ross, if she is as sensible as she is beautiful, will be greatly obliged to anyone who will release her from her engagement; and—"

"Well?" said Sir Hugh, as the man hesitated.

"And I think," Latrelle continued slowly and meaningfully, "that if I should put it out of her power to throw me over."

"How?" Sir Hugh asked quietly, betraying his eagerness, as he sat up in his chair and faced his servant.

"By marrying her out of hand, Sir Hugh."

"That is easier said than done, Latrelle," Sir Hugh rejoined, a disappointed shadow flitting over his face.

"Not in this country, Sir Hugh."

"Not in this country?" interrogated Sir Hugh, in a puzzled tone; and then, as he looked up, he found Latrelle's blue eyes with an intense significance in their earnest gaze fixed upon his face.

For a moment the master and man looked at each other in silence; then Sir Hugh said quietly:

"I am very dense, I am afraid, but I don't understand. Just explain it to me, Latrelle, how it is easier in this country than in any other to put it out of a lady's power to jil you?"

"It is very easy, Sir Hugh, seeing that we are neither in France, where it is as difficult to get married as to undo that marriage, nor in England where it is rather easier to up'd than do; but," he added slowly, "we are in Scotland."

"What difference does that make?"

"Just all the difference, Sir Hugh. There was another pause, and then Sir Hugh said, with some irritation:

"Just explain yourself, Latrelle. What are you beating about the bush for?"

"I will explain myself willingly, Sir Hugh, if you will spare me half an hour. I could not undertake in less time to tell you the story of Miss Ross's mother, which will be the best explanation I can give you."

"The story of Miss Ross's mother?" Sir Hugh repeated slowly.

"Yes, Sir Hugh. Can you spare me so much time? Half an hour will suffice."

"Take an hour then," Sir Hugh said hurriedly. "But come to the point."

There was a pretty little French pendule on the mantel-piece in Sir Hugh's room, and as he glanced at it impatiently, he saw that it marked the half hour after three. At five o'clock, when a servant came up to say that a carriage was waiting to take Sir Hugh and Major Stuart to Maxwell, the baronet was still in earnest conference with his valet:

Granulation of the Eyelids

Is Cured by Dr. Chase's Ointment—Scores of Uses for the Great Soothing, Healing Ointment.

Most people know Dr. Chase's Ointment best as a cure for eczema and itching piles. Nor is this to be wondered at when you think of the remarkable record made in this class of cures.

But there are scores of other uses for this ointment, which are only discovered when it is kept constantly at hand.

Mrs. Martin, 13 Carroll Street, Toronto, formerly of Bowmanville, Ont., writes: "We have used Dr. Chase's Ointment for years, and found it invaluable in treating skin irritation and all sorts of burns and wounds. In fact, we would not be without it in the house. It is a most excellent treatment for granulated eyelids from which I suffered without finding anything to help me."

Wherever there is itching of the skin or a sore that refuses to heal you can use Dr. Chase's Ointment with full assurance that it will prove extremely satisfactory. 40 cents a box, all dealers, or Edmanston, Bates & Co., Limited, Toronto.

but Latrelle had finished his explanation, and they were busy with the application of Mrs. Ross's story—that story which her daughter had never heard.

CHAPTER IX.

Goldenheart sat in the drooping of leaves that fell like a shower of gold. And thought, "When a lover his song of love weaves—"

Pray, how shall his merit be told? Him will I put to some desperate test.

And so shall I gather who loveth me best.

Goldenheart dear, Goldenheart dear.

This pondered of lovers who yet should appear."

Shirley Ross's rich sweet voice rang through the oak parlor, and Ruby Capel looked up laughingly from her crouch, as she listened to the song.

Half a dozen girls were grouped about the room in various attitudes of rest and ease, and the fire was blazing up cheerily, casting a pleasant red glow over the polished oaken panelling and wainscoting, and the graceful figures lounging about on sofas and arm-chairs; and Ruby herself, looking like some bright foreign bird in her quaint tea-gown of some gay Eastern-looking material, was sitting on the hearth-rug a la Turque, making a pretty little picture.

It was the afternoon of the last day of the year, and a cold, blustering December day. All the preparations for the evening were completed. Lady Fairholme and the chaplons were resting in their respective bedrooms, and the male portion of the visitors had been summarily sent off to the billiard-room by Miss Capel, who asserted, that if they worried them all the afternoon they would have nothing left to say for the evening, so that the girls were alone, and were making the most of their solitude—a noisy, merry, chatty solitude.

"We want to be fresh for this evening," Ruby had declared merrily; "and we shall not be if we have to amuse you all the afternoon."

So the lords of creation had made a virtue of necessity, and taken themselves away to the billiard-room, where they consoled themselves with billiards and pool, while the girls assembled round the fire in the oak parlor and gossiped over their afternoon tea, and dreamed of past, present, and future conquests, while Shirley's white fingers ran swiftly over the black and white keys, filling the room with melody.

Gaily and sweetly—Shirley's voice had lost its pathetic thrill now, but it had not lost its sweetness—the rich tones rang out—

"Goldenheart dear, Goldenheart dear. This pondered of lovers who yet should appear."

"Who yet shall appear?" laughed Ruby Capel. "Not like yours, Shirley!"

Biggest Bird in

THE Ostrich, Whose Feathers Have Been Sought for Centuries.

The ostrich is a bird long of leg and short of brain. If it ran in a straight line, a man would require a 60-horse power automobile to catch it. It runs in long curves and men on horseback catch it by cutting corners. The high cost of living does not affect ostriches much. They like rich grasses and almost any vegetation, but in the hard times eat nails, tin cans, parrots, and other useless things. A full grown ostrich reaches the height of six to eight feet, and it is the largest bird now extant. The ostrich has wings but they are of no use in flying. In fact the ostrich is not a flying bird anyway; it belongs to the class of running birds. What wings it has are used chiefly in poling over the Arabian deserts when the bird is pursued. Running and extending its wings, an ostrich, it is estimated, can cross the sands at the rate of 60 miles an hour.

Although the hen ostrich lays eggs that weigh about three pounds apiece thus being equal to a couple of dozen of ordinary hen's eggs, the bird is valued especially for the fine crop of plumage it grows. Ostrich tips have been valued in the millinery art since the days of the Roman emperors. At the spectacles in the arenas at Rome many ostriches were exhibited, and their brains were considered a delicacy on the table of Helioagalabus.

So well known are ostrich feathers that they have become figures in heraldry. Three white ostrich feathers are the well known insignia of the Prince of Wales. Tradition ascribes their use in that particular to Edward, the Black Prince, who is said to have plucked a plume of ostrich feathers—not from the tail of an ostrich—but from the casque of John of Luxembourg, King of Bohemia, who fell by his hand at Crecy. Prior to that time, however, ostrich plumes seem to have been taken by the House of Plantagenet as the official insignia. Ever since the early days of heraldry and chivalry the plumes of the ostrich have been esteemed as ornaments of headgear; nor does their use decrease. Ladies in the twentieth century are as eager to have nodding ostrich plumes above their heads as Kings and Princes were in the days gone by. Knights Templars employ the plumes on their chapeaux and the plumed knights with glittering swords are among the most picturesque uniformed bodies we have.

Ostrich farming has been found profitable in many parts of the world. In South Africa great ranches exist where the birds are raised for their plumage, which is plucked twice a year. The feathers are worth about $125 a pound, the price sometimes ranging as high as $250. There are 24 large feathers on each wing of the
