A FOOLISH INVITATION.

Why do people invite people to impose upon them and then complain because the invitation is accepted? Whose fault is it that the invitation was extended in the first place?

Of course the person who received the invitation might have had the strength of character to refuse, and to say, "I will deal fairly even when you lay yourself open to unfair treatment," but it takes a whole of character to do that.

Too Low a Price.

I know a woman who rented a room to a girl who had an excellent position in a shop and could afford to pay well for it. But instead of asking her what she should have asked the landlady put the price at $11 for a large room, board, (including a lunch to carry), washing, and the use of the telephone. Other women were getting $15 for the same kind of accommodations without washing.

Naturally the girl snapped up the opportunity. However, being of the disposition that is always ready to accept an invitation to impose, she let her washing get larger and larger, was so unkind in her use of the telephone that she constantly inconvenienced the other members of the family by her long conversation, and so untidy in her room that her landlady was forced to do a valet's service as well as a chambermaid's.

The Volcano Erupts.

You would have thought that when the landlady found out that she was being taken advantage of she would have told the girl that she would have to pay more for so many privileges. But no, the people who extend these foolish invitations don't solve their problems as simply as that. What they usually do is this. They groan but to others about him or her. To the person's face they are either frankly unamiable without explanation or they still maintain their resentment is piling up until finally there is a volcanic outburst and the diplomatic relations are abruptly severed.

What that woman will probably do is to stand it as long as she can and then turn out her boarder altogether.

A Peep at the Pin-Maker

MACHINE THAT SEEMS ALMOST HUMAN.

Although the making of a pin is not such a complicated matter as the manufacture of needles, it passes through many processes before it is ready for the market.

In the latest improved method of making pins, red copper and zinc are put into a crucible, and the amalgam obtained by fusing the two metals is run into moulds to form oval plates. The plates are sheared and then cut into wires. While being cut they are held fast by massive clamps. At this stage a device similar to a glazier's diamond is driven down upon the plates by a simple truck-like machine consisting of four grooved wheels and a pulley and chain.

Heavy Weights.

While the plate is held in position by the clamps, its outer edge rests against the tangent of two circular shears, which turn mechanically in opposite directions. The machine starts, the shears work, and the wires receive their points and are cut into square sections, which are seized by workmen and hooked on to one of the shear posts. A man draws the plate along, and the shears force it to turn. While the shears are paring the plate into the required shape, a sixty-pound weight drags the truck along, pressing on the shears. The shears cut all the time until the plate is pared to a diameter of forty-five millimetres. Then the wire from the square sections goes to the wire drawers, where the ends are pointed by file or hammer.

Forming the Heads.

Later the wire is straightened, drawn, and turned. It presents its extremity and is met by a little mallet, which gives it the three short, sharp raps which form its head. The fully-formed pin wire is now cut into sections. As the sections are cut they fall on to a grooved slide. The groove catches the pins by their heads, and they are manipulated by a long, rapidly revolving moulder.

The pin is then pushed away from the machine from behind, drawn back, and then forced forward, revolving as it moves along. As the pin advances along the screen or sieve, its body lies almost wholly on the runner. When it reaches the end of the long screen it falls into the box which has been set to catch it.

Strikers' Savagery.

Shocking and almost unbelievable savagery has marked the first shedding of blood in the American coal strike, and brought about the deaths of 44 men. At Herrin, in the State of Illinois, the owners of a mine whose men were on strike attempted to resume operations with non-union men, and to intimidate the strikers posted armed guards and a machine gun about the mine. The strikers in great force besieged the mine, and after firing all night the non-union men ran up a flag of truce. They were told to come out and they would not be harmed, but as they surrendered they were disarmed and tied together in groups of three and six and ordered to march. They had gone but a few paces when they were fired upon. Some of the wounded in falling pulled down their comrades who while struggling on the ground were fired upon at short range. Others managed to break their bonds and were shot down. One of the invaders asked for the name of the machine gunner. He was pointed out and shot in his tracks, and his body laid over the gun.

Men, writhing in agony and dying, begged piteously for a drink of water. It was denied them amid the taunts and jeers of men and women.
