By Mary S. Hancock.

All her light curling hair was gathered anto heavy coils on her head, but a few tendrils had escaped, and wreathed in low clusters on her forehead, while her bright eyes looked fearlessly into their faces and clusters on her forehead, while her bright eyes looked fearlessly into their faces and gave back smile for smile. She had taken off her cloak and hat and hung them up behind her, for the room often became hot and stifling, and she could not stand that. When I saw her, she was singing while the cirks worked. She had to what the instant reply. "The blissid young lady, yer riv'rence's sisther, whom the saints girls worked. She had taught them to sew, aught them with the gentlest patience in the world, I know, and had succeeded. Kate was a rare one for training, be sure of

Her head was high in the air, and the glorious tones of her voice filled the room, ringing out over the atmosphere all laden with frivolity and sin as it might be, and she sang on and on unwearingly, until many of the girls were quietly wiping away the tears that rose unbidden to their eyes, of which they would have been heartily ashamed outside. When they were more than usually on the rampage, or the warpath, Kate would stand forth and call out:

"Girls, I am going to sing."
It was enough. Every strong-armed young woman, by virtue of her strength, tore down upon her neighbors and carried the day by force of arms; then a great silence would fall upon the place, and Kate's voice would reign supreme. I tell you—sister of mine though she may be—I hall not soon forget the impression she made upon me when I heard her.

They tell me she had other auditors sometimes, of whom she knew nothing. I heard, for instance, how one night a gang of carousers from a public house near by came along joyously to make a swoop upon the damsels and upset the decorum of the Assembly. But when they neared the door Kate was singing. The lade gathered round the half-open

Not a man of them dare venture inside. As for their bravado, it died away in harmless smoke—they stood and gazed and stared. Some slunk away; they had heard

Others remained to the end, and sighed when her songs were over. But no one ever thought of disturbing

Kate after that.
Once or twice I met the vicar near the turning to the schoolroom, and bowed as I passed him. He returned the greeting, and pursued the open road. I never connected him with Kate's work. It was Clara De Grev Stranton herself who startled me.

What a gift your sister has!" she re-"And what a peculiar girl she is ! one will not come here, and yet she sings by the hour to those half-civilized girls in St. Anne's Lane. It is for the sake of the old vicar, no doubt."

CHAPTER III.

The dear girl tossed her pretty little head, with those tightly crimped curlets that I knew so well as she said these words, and I stood aghast.

"No, Clara, my darling," I murmured softly, my arm stealing round her waist. 'No, Clara, my beloved. Kate has no liking for old men. Kate is useful to me; she has her brother's interests at heart. her brother's welfare. These demand all her time, and all attention. She has no eyes for elderly gentlemen."

"And young ones have none for her," retorted my betrothed quickly. "But oh, Edwin, must she always live with us?—I mean—I mean—" Here the dear girl buried her head on my shoulder, and was overcome by her feelings for a few seconds, while I endeavored to calm her agitated emotions.

"The subject of Kate," I began in my most clerical tones; "the subject of my sister's residence here is unfortunately beyond my control. My parents seem to consider that their business. But when—when we arrange matters, darling"—(here I dropped the cleric and became human)— "then I will take the reins into my own hands and Kate can return home once more." This pacified Clara, I am sure I do nore. This pacified Clara, I am sure I do not know why. I never can understand flow it is that marriage generally causes such upsets in families. We are told that a man must "cleave" to his wife; but why that should mean that he should deliberate. ly set himself, in so many cases, dead against his own friends and relatives, is really beyond my comprehension.

However, Clara is not in that position as yet, so she was taking time by the forelock, so to say. in the attitude she was assuming toward Kate. My sister was a very decided convenience to me, one I declined to part with until 1 had the opportunity of replacing her. So, while I tenderly appeased Clars. I still held my own way with regard to Kate, upon whom I intended to keep a strict watch in future.

not share that opinion; but old maids are peculiarly sensitive to looks on the part of their clergy, and not too discriminating

It is true that he carefully abstained from more than the merest passing ac-luaintance with them, never presenting himself at any of the little tea drinkings which were so common among us, and mever by any chance putting in an appearance at Mrs. De Grey Stranton's, even when a hig "spread" was under way.

Mrs. De Grey Stranton liked a "little party." She aired her best china and her attique electro-plate on those occasions, for which the household was in purgatory for a whole week, while Gemima's tears were frequent, and her grimminess greater han usual during the mysterious processes of preparation. It would have gratified Mrs. De Grey Stranton if she could have enticed the vicar to grace her tea-table and eat her cakes

But it was not to be. He was blessed-or cursed, which you prefer—with a digestion, and hence was "obliged to live carefully," an expression which I have since learned to believe was a pious fib invented to save appearances. The Vicar's abstention was not my loss.

It was distinct'y my gain. If he had a digestion, I had no qualms about mine. Three-and-twenty is a glorious age, A man has the digestion of an ostrich and the vigor of a Hercules—or ought to have, if he be managed properly. And I was in my element at our local tea drinkings. It is, even now, a part of my parochial duty which I understand to perfection and enjoy, and in those early days of my work it was just exactly what I delighted in. Perhaps I should not have enjoyed these gatherings so much bad my vicar been there. In the tender years of a curate's the he does not hunger and thirst for his icar's bodily presence wherever he appears He likes to float before the popular gaze by nimself, to pirouette, as it were, upon a platform all by himself, and to display his new "clericals" unabashed by other priestly presence. The girls admire him unre-strainedly, and he is able to exhibit himself to more purpose in his superior's ab-

Kate, too, kept aloof from these social gatherings. Kate had plenty on her hands with the babies and the old men and the rough girls. I took care that she had something to do; occupation, as I have said before, is good for young women of Kate's age.

But, after Clara's remark, I kept presarve! she was alone hersilf all the night; an' me sittin' by the kitchen foire th' whole toime whativir." Mrs. Malony is a great talker, so I did not hear half she said. I have reason to believe she did not tell the truth; and if I had only seen her five minutes later in her kitchen I should have been quite sure of the fact, for this is what she did, I was told long afterward. She flung herself down on her low chair in front of the fire, and, tossing the corner of her huge white apron over her head, gave vent to a series of chuckles and laughs that scared her niece who lived with her, and rest in the shade of the trees." Thus spoke the dying hero, Stonewall Jackson. a man whose conception of war was so heroic, so chivalric, that friends and foes praise him alike. How many dispirited women feel that they would indeed like "to cross over the river and rest." Every day brings its measure of annoyance and pain. If only they could be made to realize the inestimable comfort and physical strength to be found in Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescripe tion, they would soon feel that "their ways were ways of pleasantness, their paths were paths of peace."

The man who thinks he can do anything finds it difficult to do something, and generally winds up by doing nothing.

Untold Misery-What a Well-Known Commercial Traveler Suffered, and How He Was Cured .- Gentlemen,-About five years ago I began to be troubled with dyspepsia, and for three years suffered untold misery, from this terrible complaint. I was at that time traveling for Messrs. Walter Woods & Co., Hamilton, and was treated by some of the best physicians in the country, but all to no purpose. I continued to grow worse, one day I was in-duced to try a bottle of Northrop & Lyman's VEGETABLE DISCOVERY, and to my great surprise and joy, I soon began to improve. I continued using this medicine, and when the third bottle was finished I found I was entirely cured; and as a year has elapsed since then, I feel confident that the cure is complete and permanent. To My vicar was said by the numerous all afflicted with this distressing complaint widows and spinsters who attended our church to be singularly handsome. I did Vegetable Discovery, believing that the persistent use of it will cure any case of dyspepsia. (Signed.) T. S. McInter.
