

A Detrolter's Cat.

The following story is told by a well-known Detrolter and is vouched for as true. He is also willing to show them the cat: "It would make you laugh until your sides ached to see my little girl's pet cat pickles. The only way that we can account for her liking of the strongest kind of mustard pickles is that at every meal she had to share the chair of her little mistress and have a taste of everything good on the table. Well, she started on sweet pickles, and she is now like the old toper who started drinking sweet cider and will not look at anything weaker than 'old rye.' She is a great cat to catch English sparrows. She starts out about eleven o'clock a.m., and generally within the hour she has a sparrow caught. She kills it at once, then jumps up on the window sill and makes a noise until someone, mostly always her little owner, who is on the watch for her, raises the window and lets her in. She is then shown into the back kitchen, and after tossing and playing with her sparrow just as a cat does with a mouse, she eats it, feathers and all. Now she wants her dish of pickles, and if she is not waited on at once she makes more fuss than a tramp who is asked to saw a stick of wood before he eats a good dinner. As soon as she has satisfied herself on pickles she stretches herself out before the fire and looks happier than a king. Now, the strangest part of this story is to be told. Before this cat took to eating pickles she was spotted, gray and white, but she gradually turned a rich golden colour, just as near the colour of mustard pickles as could be. To look at her when the sun shines on her she looks like old gold, and is a pretty sight."
