

An Attractive Bungalow

IN the bungalow illustrated herewith is shown the home of W. Breden Galbraith, architect, built in Lawrence Park, North Toronto. The design, with the tuck-pointed stonework, projecting rafter and beam ends, pergolas and pergola gateways and the interesting brick steps and electric light post, is more than suggestive of the California bungalow type, a type that has endeared itself to many in our Northern climate and one that is gradually becoming one of our own Canadian types of domestic architecture. Strictly speaking, the bungalow is a one-story building, but the term is in general use as applied to our adaptation to the two story dwelling.

In the home illustrated, the lower walls are of paving blocks of a rich dark red coloring, showing a 4 in. x 8½ in face, with wide, black mortar joint; these are backed with 4 in. hollow tile; the upper walls are of plaster on 8 in. tile. This heavy brick is in harmony with the heavy beams, and the whole forms a splendid background for the roses, which are the predominating features in the garden. Incidentally, instead of the usual cement driveway to the garage, two narrow trenches were dug and filled with cinders, well rammed down, forming tracks for the car but being more or less overgrown by the grass; with the shrubbery on each side, the effect is that of a country lane.

The illustration loses somewhat of the effect of the very wide, deep verandah, owing to the presence of the storm sash. The front door proper, also, is not in view, and is constructed of heavy planks, bolted together with wide iron

LAWRENCE PARK BUNGALOW, HOME OF W. BREDEN GALBRAITH.

BEDROOM, LAWRENCE PARK BUNGALOW.

LIVING ROOM, LAWRENCE PARK BUNGALOW.