

their sacrifice shall make more certain the sane and wholesome progress of the world for which they gave their lives. The people of Canada are more determined than ever that the just cause for which these men strove shall prevail, and that there can be no payment so heavy as not to be warranted for this purpose. The noble deaths of noble men given in a noble cause is an inspiration which reaches to the understanding of even the dullest, and from the seed that these men have sown will grow blossoms in soil from which such flowers could scarcely be expected.

There is only one thing more horrible than such a war as this, and that is the condition which makes such a war possible. The frightfulness of the crime of this war is being impressed upon the world to such an extent that the determination to end once and for all time the sources from which such wars can spring is unalterable. We will pay the cost this time; we will send our bravest and our best beloved; we will endure all that is necessary to establish our just purpose to the end that neither our children nor our children's children shall ever again be called upon to pay such a toll to barbarism.

We believe that we know the cause of wars and that the remedy which shall make them impossible between enlightened peoples is clear and