Among other practical subjects of increast illustrated in Popular Gardening is the culture of the grape, from which we append the following: A tree grows upright and supports itself, while a vine trails and needs a support. The one may bear fruit on eld wood and spurs, but the other only bears from the new wood, which must be assumply renewed.

S. The stilling may proceed every day, were second day, or every third due to the other only bears from the new wood, which must be assumply renewed.

Procure good strong, well rooted 1-year-old vines, shorten in their roots to about 12 inches long, dip them in water and keep meist. Now let one person go in advance and dig out the holes for planting, about 18 inches long, 12 wide and 18 deep on the lower side of the stakes, and close to them without removing them. If the ground is level always open the hole on the same side of the stake and with the rows.

I also put a rough covering of about two feet above my banks to keep the pelting rain from washing the dirt off and to keep a more even temperature, and remove it as soon as the weather turns warm or mild; and thus I never lose my sweet potatoes.

Stakes should now be procured about five feet long and about one inch and a half in diameter, which will do to train the vines on the first two years.

Ohio Farmer also gives a plan for saving selected seed corn, which it is adding selected seed corn, which it is adding selected seed corn. generally recommended they would grow about ten or twelve feet long, and concentrate too much growth on the top of the vine, which would have to be cut away. But if we train four canes they will each be shorter and shorter jointed,

Whatever gives an undue length of growth without corresponding stockiness adds succulence to the growth of both roots and stock. This may be verified by the long slender plants, being deficient in strength and hardiness as the leaves are thinner and thrown farther apart. This is a very important principle in grape training.

Things That Are Told. A New Jersey farmer says that an infallible test of the vitality in an egg, true freshness, is to hold the broad end of the egg, gently pressed, to the tip of your tongue. If fresh it will be distinctly warmer than the tongue, while the small end is as distinctly cold. If the egg is not fresh both ends are cold on account of losing its vitality.
