the article desired. Then she resumed her look. "Sister Rosie—Poy"—The voice came from a little chubby boy of five. "Won't you please tell me a story?" "Why, of course I will, my precious," said the young girl, seizing the little fellow and she eagerly listened while she told him such a fairy story that his eyes grew larger and larger, and his mouth wider and wider, until he soon fell fast asleep.

"I don't think I shall read any more now," said Rosie to herself. "It is time to go to the piano. I have to run over those scales." And she darted up the stairs and had just opened the piano, when her father appeared at the doorway.

"You would oblige me, my darling," he said, "if you would close that piano. My head aches dreadfully."

"All right, papa. I will get up early to-morrow and finish the exercises." And she closed the piano softly, then quietly left the room as her mother entered.

"What a beautiful disposition that child has!" said Mr. Oppenheim. "It is your training, my love."

"But I do wish that she was a little prettier, Joseph."

"Not for the world, not for the world, Hannah. Believe me, she is a little beauty as she is; and if God spares her, her features will grow more regular."

Rosie did not hear her father's remarks, although she felt that she was loved even more tenderly from that hour. But the sunbeam that caught her merry laughter and bore it to the clouds heard the words of praise, and shone in extra lovely colors that evening.—Jewish Messenger.
