WILHELM'S CAREER AS "WAR LORD"

in the Caribbean; but neither power ventured trouble, and indeed that year marked the beginning of excessive correlations between Germany and the United States. Prince Henry's visit to this country was followed by a number of indications of the Emperor's sympathy for the United States and the Roosevelt family. The institution of the exchange professorships in 1903 was perhaps the culmination of this movement. Already it became evident that the really serious international rivalry was that between Germany and England; and with the first symptoms of friction with Japan many Americans were inclined to think that Britain would find it need be, aid her allies against the United States.
His feelings, however, soon disappeared under the influence of the expression of British public sentiment, and on that time dates the waning of the German influence in this country.
The Emperor and his Ambassador, von Sternberg and von Bernhard, labored so hard to build up the year 1902 was the last England and Germany acted together. Already naval and commercial rivalry had come menacing to both countries.
The Russo-Japanese war broke the English naturally sympathized with their allies; the Germans, trained the Emperor to fear the "Yellow Peril," strongly supported Russia. That year saw the Entente Cordiale between the British and the French, crystallized in 1905 to save France from the humiliation of the first Morocco crisis.
Germany at this period wanted an outlet commercially in Northwest Africa, which France, who with stand had come to an agreement regarding the disposal of Morocco, did not concede. In January, 1905, German Emperor made a visit to Paris, in which he practically assured the Sultan of Morocco of his good will against the French; and as soon as that time was not prepared war, he escaped only upon the mediation of Delcasse, his irreconcilable Foreign Minister.
In formation of the Triple Entente exposed Germany to few dangers—the full importance of which, however, her statesmen do not seem to have reas-sed. At all events, Russia was the opponent in the next international difficulty in which Germany became embodied following the Turkish revolution of 1908, when Bulgaria declared her independence and Austria-Hungary seized the opportunity to declare the formal annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Russia's protests against the action of the Dual Monarchy were by the German "in shining armor," as the Kaiser said afterward—who came to the aid of their ally and recompensed her for her loyal support in the Moroccan crisis. The result was that perhaps the greatest victory for German diplomacy without a war was achieved.

many cases to have represented, if not the whole nation, at least its imperialist elements.
Interest in the Orient.
One department of German foreign affairs, however, unquestionably owes much to the Emperor and his conception, sometimes as a possible field for action of his office. His imagination always leaned toward the Orient—sometimes as a threatening quarter from which would come eventually great danger to all Western civilization, sometimes as a possible field for German activity. He himself was largely responsible for the move to Kiao-Chau in 1897, and he felt more interest in this colony than in most of the others. Still more important, however, were his activities in the near East. Beginning with a first visit to Constantinople from Athens, whither he had gone to attend the wedding of his sister in 1893, he followed up his courtship of the Turkish Empire by a second, more formal and more friendly visit in 1898, when his marks of favor to Abdul Hamid were deeply resented by the Liberals of Western Europe.
The result of this activity was the establishment of friendly relations between Constantinople and Berlin, the training of the Turkish Army by German officers, and the concession to German capitalists of permission to build a railroad to Bagdad.
Toward France the Emperor maintained for the most part the characteristic Prussian attitude. There are persistent reports, however, that he paid a number of visits to Paris incognito.
His liking for English ways was well known, and on his frequent visits to that country he attempted, without much success, to ally British suspicions of the designs of his people.
Besides his characteristics as a soldier, religious enthusiast, devotee of the mystical theory of sovereignty, and a moral reformer, the Emperor was widely renowned for many years for his claims to be an artist and an art critic, as to the genuineness of which there was never much agreement. As early as 1892 he began to paint—miniatures, for the most part—and later branched out into various fields of art.
It was perhaps this, combined with his first statements of the Divine right theory, which were anything but popular among the Liberals of Germany, that led to the publication in 1894 of the anonymous pamphlet, "Has Caligula a Parallel in Our Own Times?" in which a number of his acts were likened to those of the mad Roman Emperor. His artistic activity, however, more naturally suggested the comparison with Nero, which was frequently made by critics during the latter part of his life. Apparently, like Nero, he had considerable artistic desire and some artistic talent; but how much of the latter he really possessed is next to impossible to say. It is usually difficult for a King to have a fair chance to display any gifts he may have outside his own field of usefulness. Probably his best known work was the cartoon, drawn in 1900, representing Civilization in shining armor calling to Europe to rise against the Yellow Peril.

In one line, however, his excellence was undisputed. Despite the handicap of a weak arm, he was an excellent pianist. Other ventures into the musical field, such as "The Song to Aegir," which he composed in 1894, were not so successful.
As An Art Patron.
As a patron of art more than as an artist he strove to excel, and was keenly interested in the Royal Opera and Royal Theatre in Berlin. His preference for Americans in the former brought down on him much criticism from conservative German nationalists.
He drew up the general plan for the Hohenzollern statues in the Siegessalles, in Berlin; was the patron of Leonardo's opera, "Roland of Berlin," and in 1908 inaugurated and partly designed the historical pageant and ballet of Sardanapalus, which was designed to recreate the last age of Assyria as he saw it. A work of art, however, it proved quite dreary, and the critics were unanimous in declaring that only genius could have lived up to such a subject.
In the early days of his reign—the Caligula days—when there was much talk of the Reine-Kaiser, who spent all of his time in trips to other countries, and the Parade-Kaiser, who was always in full dress, he lacked anything like the popularity that had been won by his grandfather and his father.

"Unser Fritz." Later, however, the general sentiment was much modified.
With the Emperor, who was Prince Auguste Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein, he has lived since their marriage on the 27th of February, 1881.
They have seven children—the Crown Prince Friedrich Wilhelm, Prince Eitel Friedrich, Adalbert, August Wilhelm, Oscar, and Joachim, and Princess Victoria Louise, now the wife of the Duke of Brunswick.
Conundrums for Christmas.
Why is an egg overdone like an egg underdone? Because it is hardly done.
When do your teeth usurp the function of your tongue? When they chatter.
Which is the greatest riddle in the world? Life, because we must all give it up.
Why is a tramcar a safe place in the thunderstorm? Because it has a conductor.
What knitting is every boy able to do without knitting needles? Knitting his brows.
Why is a starving man like a baker?
Because he needs (kneads) bread.
What country, when robbed of its tail, names a part of the face? (China) the chin.
What is that which is always in dread but never in fear? The letter D.
What is the difference between a tube and a foolish Dutchman? One is a hollow cylinder and the other is a silly Hollander.
Why is the letter E considered the most unfortunate of letters? It is never out of debt and always in danger.
Why are ducks generally very short affairs? It only takes two seconds to arrange them.
What will a stone become when thrown into water? It will become wet.
Why is the letter G like frosty weather?
It makes old people cold people.
Why is an old coat like an iron hat?
It represents hard-wear.
It's nearing Christmas, don't you see,
So I suppose, it's up to me To dig down deep, like all papers, And in return get bum clear.

Everybody Accommodated.
Tommy (Just off train, with considerable luggage)—"Cabby, how much is it for me to Litchford?" Cabby—"Two shillings, sir." Tommy—"How much for my luggage?"
Cabby—"Free, sir." Tommy—"Take the luggage, I'll walk."—Boston Transcript.
A Proper Start.
"So your husband refused to buy you an automobile?"
"Not exactly refused," he said.
"I ought first to become familiar with machinery in general, so he bought me a sewing-machine."—Boston Transcript.
The Cards Are Out.
"The wedding cards are out and they are rehearsing the ceremony."
"Where's the groom?"
"He seems to be lost in the shuffle." Thousands to the Good.
"Had my fortune told today dear."
"What a waste of money," said her husband.
"Not at all. I gave the woman fifty centes and she told me I would inherit $50,000. Wasn't that a bargain?"

familiar.
Yardley—Probably you saw his picture in the papers; it used to appear quite often a few years ago. Then he was called the "Crown Prince." Question for Question.
Hub—Why does a woman say she's been shopping when she hasn't bought anything?
Wife—Why does a man say he's been fishing when he hasn't caught anything?
