seemed real that you could care, in spite of all-that you'd forgive me, if you should come back--"

"Did you want me to come?"

ie?

iat

vas

out

red

ved

etly

on

the

up

eess , to

ling pity

the rms

my

nout

yes.

lest

g int, of

was

ered.

ed as

never

"Oh, 'want' isn't the word to express it!"

"Even though you dreaded—being found out!"

"That didn't count, against having you alive, and knowing you were in the world-if only for your parents' sake. I wanted them to be happy, more than I wanted anything for myself except Brian's good. I had you for my own, in my dreams, while you were dead, and I expected to lose you if you were alive. But-"

"You really expected that?"

"Oh, indeed, yes!"

"Although you knew from Mother how I'd loved you, and searched for you?"

"You thought I was good—then."

"I think so now."

"But you can't! You know what a wicked, wicked wretch I was! Why, when you came into this room and looked at me, I saw how you felt! And your letter-"

"Don't you understand, I was testing you? If you hadn't cared for me, what you did might have been -(only 'might', mind yon, for what man can judge a girl's heart?) what you did to my people might have been crue! and calculating. I had to find out the truth of things, before letting myself go. The letter was written to let a stranger see-if you turned out to be a stranger-what to expect. But O'F well made me sure in a minute, that the girl here must be my Gir. After that, I'd only to see you-to ask if he told the truth-to watch your faceyour precious, beautiful face! I thou '+ of it and pic-