A party of New Yorkers were on the B. & W. going out to Westport last evening. They seemed to be impressed with the idea that they were on the N. Y. C. or L. S. line, as they rushed into the pullman at Brockville and by depositing coats, grips, hats and fishing tackle, on the seats, managed to occupy or lay claim to nearly half the seats in the car. The fun of the thing, however, was in the fact that only one seat was occupied from Brockville to Athens, some of the party finding it necessary to get off the stool of vile Canadian whiskey with which their stomachs were loaded.

The big storm of Friday apparently did considerable damage to crops north of this village, but, apart from the untimely rain accompanying it, little loss was sustained here. Regarded from a purely spectacular point of view, it presented one of the grandest heavenly displays imaginable. About 8 o'clock a large cloud of deepest, darkest blue rose rapidly above the north-west horizon. As it approached the zenith two wavy white lines arched across it, and near the horizon a long line of clouds appeared, looking like softest drapery. When the clearly defined edge of the dark cloud was directly overhead, an upper-current of air appeared to catch the white lines and as they burst beyond their dark background in rolling volumes, they presented a most awe-inspiring sight. A few seconds later a storm of wind struck this village, filling the air with dust and bending stout trees like rushes. Then followed the rain, which continued all the evening.
