IVANHOR

Fitzurse arose while Prince

John spoke, and gliding behind the seat of the Saxon, whispered to him not to omit the opportunity of putting an end to unkinduess bet wixt the two races, by naming Prince John. The Saxon replied not to this politic insinuation, but, ising up, and filling his cup to the brim. he addressed Prince John in these words: 'Your highness has acquired that I should name a Norman deserving to be remembered at our banquet. This, perchance, is a hard task, since it calls on the slave to sing the praises of the master-upon the vanquished, while pressed by all the evils of conquest, to sing the praises of the conqueror. Yet I will name a Norman-the first in arms and in place-the best and the nublest of his race. And the lips that shall retuse to pledge me to his well-earned fame, I termed false and dishonored, and will so maintain ers for their patronage during the past, them with my life. I quaff this begs leave to request a continuance of public, to the health of Richard the goblet to the health of Richard the Lion-hearted."

Prince John, who had expected that his own name would have closed the Saxon's speech, started when that of his injured brother was so unexpectedly introduced. He raised nechanically the wine cup to his lips, then instantly set it down, to view the demeanor of the company at this unexpected proposal, which many of them felt it as unsafe to oppose as to comply with. Some of them, ancient and SCOTCII TWEEDS, experienced courtiers, closely imitated the example of the Prince himself, raising the goblet to their lips, attention of our patrons to our stock of and again replacing it before them. There were many who, with a more gener us feeling, exclaimed, "Long live King Richard! and may he be speedily restored to us!" And some ew, among whom were Front-de-Bout and the Templar, in sullen disdain suffered their goblets to stand untasted before them. But no man ventured directly to gainsay a pledge filled to the health of the reigning monarch.
