

Every Woman Knows

how necessary it is to use good flour in order to obtain the best results in baking. It is no more costly to use the best flour than it is to use one of inferior grade—and the results are not to be compared. Flours are usually milled for bread making or pastry making, not for both, and that is where the housewife is put to unnecessary inconvenience and expense.

"BEAVER" FLOUR

is not only the best bread flour, but is the best pastry flour. It is a careful, scientific blend of the rich, nutritious Manitoba Spring wheat and the wheat from which the best pastry flour in the world is made—Ontario Fall wheat.

BEAVER FLOUR contains the gluten of the Manitoba wheat that gives nourishment to the system and the properties of the Ontario wheat that make the lightest and whitest rolls and the most delicate pastry.

Baking is a pleasure with BEAVER FLOUR, for the results are unvaryingly good, and you have only one sack of flour to buy, to make the best looking, best tasting and most nutritious bread and the lightest cakes and pastry.

It makes more loaves to the barrel than any other flour, and relieves you of all anxiety as to how the bread or pastry will turn out. Get it from your grocer, and convince yourself.

Tale of Mystery

CHAPTER VI. A RECKLESS ENEMY.

For the moment she was literally afraid to expose him; and when she went downstairs again it was with the resolve to say nothing that night, but to wire the first thing in the morning to Tom to come at once to London and help her to right matters. At the same time she resolved to have the poison analysed.

As soon as she opened the drawing-room door, the Count's eyes fell on her and she seemed to read in his face that he had guessed the object of her absence from the room and what she had discovered.

Five minutes later a manoeuvre of his brought Dora and George Vezey together at one end of the room; and then making an excuse he crossed directly to Dora, who shuddered as he approached.

"I want you to see this view, Miss Merrion, and let me tell you what happened here," he said. He was holding a photograph in his hand and spoke loud so that the others could hear. But as soon as he was by the girl's side, he dropped his voice, and said quietly, and as though he was describing some incident connected with the photograph.

"I know where you have been and

why. You think you have made a discovery. I know that I have. Be careful what you do. I know you now, and will speak to you to-morrow at eleven o'clock, at the farther end of the square, near Cromwell Rd. We must understand one another, you and I, and be friends, or it is you, not I, will suffer. Be warned in time. I will give you the proofs you want, together with some others you don't want—this, with a pause and a smile of infinite cunning and menace—"to-morrow morning. Yes, just at that point," he broke off, speaking in another tone, as Mrs. Markham came towards the pair, in pursuit of him, to hear what he had to say to Dora. "The hung there for two hours," and in a light airy manner he continued the description of an imaginary incident, speaking in a manner that suggested he had been relating it to Dora before Mrs. Markham joined them.

But the girl herself was thinking not of that, but of the challenge which she read in his words, and looked so grave that Mrs. Markham rattled her upon being scared by the Count's story.

CHAPTER VII.

"I want to know also who you are," said Dora, looking straight into her friend's face. "There's something, Dora. I've been looking at you a dozen times to day, and each time the worried look has seemed to increase. Have you any other kind of trouble?"

"Nothing that concerns myself; and nothing I shouldn't be able to tell you in a day or so," said the girl.

"Why not now? The time is never too soon for a confidence."

"Why not now?" repeated Dora, lapsing then into silence, as she weighed whether she would or not tell Dora what her real suspicions of the Count were. She longed to warn her and put her on her guard, but she could not help feeling that to do that without having the actual proof would do little good, and might do harm.

"The evidence was not sufficient to at once convince the widow that the lover was really a scoundrel, she would be all the harder to convince in the end. Her faith must be broken at one blow, or it would survive a gradual assault."

"Why not now?" repeated Mrs. Markham very softly, pressing her companion's hand.

"No, not yet," answered Dora. "I must have a little more time."

"Is it anything—anything about Godefroi? Don't you really like him any better than you did?" She asked the question almost wistfully, rather like a child.

"I have not seen much more of him. Except this morning you have monopolised him the greater part of the time he has been in the house."

Mrs. Markham looked at her friend intently in silence for a few moments, then she sighed.

"He likes you, Dora," she said at length, "but he seems to understand that you dislike him. He is the most generous and sincere of good fellows, and he has told me how much it grieves him that you, one of my best friends, should seem to both distrust and dislike him. Have you said anything to him about this? Don't try and part us, dear. Try rather to like him. He is afraid you want to separate us, and he told me to-night it would break his heart and ruin his life if anything were to come between us. I couldn't give him up. Nothing should ever make me. Don't try, Dora. Don't for heaven's sake. I love your friendship and hold it deep in my heart. But don't ever force me to choose between friendship and love. Promise me you'll never do that. Promise me!"—and she threw her arms round Dora and kissed her, having spoken with a quite impetuous vehemence.

"I can promise you faithfully, my dear," answered the girl steadily, "that I will never ask you to choose between your friendship for me and your love for the Count de Montal."

Dora, in whose eyes the ready tears were standing, lifted her head and looked through them at her companion. Then she dashed the tears hastily away as if they interfered with her scrutinising the girl's face.

"I don't like that tone," she said. "It sounds hard and without heart, not a bit like you. What has passed between you and Godefroi to-day? Will you tell me? Something serious, I'm sure."

Dora was silent. The elder woman put her face close to the girl's, and stared eagerly and almost fiercely into it with an expression which her next question explained.

"Have you ever met him before? Do you know anything about him—about him and any other woman? Are you keeping anything from me? Dora, you mustn't do that," she said with intense earnestness. "Mark me, I don't care what there is to know about other women. Men are no saints, and nothing short of an actual legal bar between us should ever keep Godefroi and me apart. I love him with all my soul, and if ever a man loved woman he loves me. I want no more than that, and the knowledge makes me almost mad in my happiness. You can tell me anything. Let the past be what it may and as black as it may, the future he will keep white for love of me. Don't try to part us, Dora. You can't do it."

"He has been talking to you till he has excited you, Dora," said Dora, still very quietly and firmly. "What I said last night, I say to-night. If he be what you think him, the marriage will have no heartier well-wisher than I."

ENTIRELY BALD
Her Hair Commenced to Grow After Two Weeks Use of Salvia Hair Tonic.

"Fever caused me to be entirely bald. I had given up all hope of again having hair when I was advised to use Salvia. After two weeks my hair commenced to grow. I now have the most beautiful head of hair anyone ever saw. Praise to SALVIA."

Thus writes Mrs. Jackson, of New York: "We can point to thousands of instances where the proper use of SALVIA has been followed by a remarkable growth of hair."

ODD LAWS ABOUT OUR COINAGE.

It is the duty of each loyal subject not merely to refuse gold that is under a certain weight, but to break it.

"Every person," so runs the Act, "shall, by himself or others, cut, break, or deface such coin tendered to him in payment, and the person tendering the same shall bear the loss."

The weight at which a sovereign ceases to be good as currency is anything below 122½ grains, and as one sovereign in thirty-three, and one half sovereign in ten are under their legal weight, it would seem that we ought, each of us, to provide ourselves with a delicate set of pocket scales and weights unless we remain content to be inveterate breakers of the Act of 1870.

But in spite of this Act it is a risky business interfering with coins which you may suspect to be under weight or spurious. Some months ago, a Grimby woman offered a half sovereign in payment of goods to a local shopkeeper. The latter put the coin into a testing machine, and, as it broke in two, refused to take it.

The coin, however, was pronounced by experts to be perfectly genuine, and when the case was taken into a court of law the shopkeeper was ordered to refund ten shillings to the customer.

Money, both gold and silver, wears out at a startling rate. It is reckoned that there is usually a hundred million pounds in gold coin in this country, a very large proportion of which is locked in the strong rooms of banks. Yet of that which is in active circulation the wastage is so great that during every twelve months seventy thousand pounds worth of gold and silver are rubbed off into fine dust in John Bull's pockets.

The Coinage Act of 1870 empowers the Sovereign to determine the design for any coin—gold, silver or bronze. Had it seemed good to George V. to desire that sixpenny bits should be made with a hole in the centre, the Mint would have no choice but to comply.

The jury who actually try the coins are "twelve competent freemen of the mystery of goldsmiths of the City of London."

Ever one knows that it is an offence to deface a coin of the realm. Yet jewellers melt up thousands of them every month of the year. On the face of it the practice seems illegal, yet it is not really so, for the law only steps in if a person attempts to pass a coin after tampering with it.

Jewellers find sovereigns the best of all gold to work with, for, owing to the tremendous pressure they have to bear in the Mint, they are more ductile than any other gold. Besides, a sovereign melted down is still worth 19s. 10d.—Sketch.

Captain Sears Deserted His Ship.

Victoria, B. C., April 19.—(Canadian Press.)—A verdict of manslaughter was returned by Acron's jury against Capt. A. A. Sears, master of the steamer Iroquois, which foundered off Sydney, B. C., last week with a loss of 200 lives.

Capt. Sears is already under indictment for manslaughter charges, a warrant having been issued before the coroner completed his investigation.

The evidence at the inquest was to the effect that Capt. Sears, the first man to reach shore, deserted the ship while passengers were aboard and that he did not make any effort to rescue these struggling in the water. He will be arraigned Thursday.
