CHAPTER XXV.

MANGLES' REVELATIONS.

"When I came to know him in London he was deep in everything. He had cut the old homestead down in Kent, and was going it on his own hook. We drew up—he and I—and went largely into the fleeing line—you know what that is, Squire Oakley. You were shown a bit in your day—not clean, though, only clipped. You could have stood more of the shears, and we meant to cut closer but you bolted."

"No, Mangles, I was rescued—rescued by—Woggate, you know—and, and a day too soon either. I was clipped wonderfully near the skin, I can tell you—as that I was. However, that doesn't matter now. Go on with Jordan."

"Just so," continued Mangles. "I have given you his character and ways of doing. He was always on the outlook for money. Please you, his style of living swallowed lots of tin; so did mine for that matter, and we had always to have our eye open for a chance to fleece. Chances had grown rare for a while, just about the time Phil met with young Allerton. He wasn't long in spotting him, and laid his plans for a large haul. He sucked him like an orange, and saw his way to book him for five hundred. The plum was larger than anything we had smoked before, but Phil thought the chance would stand it, and that was the figure we fixed. Of course, Phil put me up to everything as it went on. He had an imp of a fellow for a servant—an ugly, mis-shapen creature—who had come from Kent with him. He was fit enough to have come from any other place, but for all that was as true as steel to Phil, and wrought the oracle for us both night or day whenever we wanted. He was a lurcher, and was named Jasper Jacquin," interpolated Edwin.

"Right you are, Sir—that was his name. Your uncle remembers him, I dare say."

The youth nodded, and Mangles went on:

"Our plans had to come to a head quickly with young Allerton, for any day supplies might reach him from the Hall, and so our prey would escape us. So we hastened things, and did the stroke at once. By this time Phil had got round him thoroughly, and Allerton trusted him as a friend, took the loan of money from him and so was bound to him entirely. The plan we had was simple enough. He had not a rap himself, and we could not cash him; but we could cash a bill of his signing, and that would do as well. Phil resolved that the bill should be on a man whose name young Allerton had taken while travelling in Scotland, and whose signature was easily imitated. Now for the working of the thing. The youth was to be brought by Phil to the saloon, and induced to play with me. Phil knew he had never played in his life, never had been within sight of the green baize; but we trusted to his desperate condition, and the sight of others playing, to bring on the fever. Once the cue was in his hand, I knew I had him safe—and so it was. I allowed him to win at first, of course; then, when the excitement rose and hope with it, I—you know, Squire?"

"Oh, yes, I know you began to cheat." "Not a bit of it, I didn't need; he was as green as grass at the game, you see, and even the poorest fair play had him. No, Squire, I didn't cheat, I only played better; and when he began to lose, Phil and I carefully watched the result. The book was firm and secure, and all we had to do was to manoeuvre our fish and land it at the right point. But the denue was he drank too fast for us, and grew frantic before we wanted him, so that by the time the five hundred was scored up he was scarcely fit for anything. This was a difficulty we had not looked for. Our intention from the first was to propose forgery to him, and Phil had eased the way by introducing him into the saloon under the name of the man on whom the bill was to be drawn. He fully expected to prevail on him to do it, not calculating that he would have got too drunk to do anything."

Still, there was nothing for it but to try it on. It was no use to ask him to write the body of the bill, so Phil did that himself, and the paper was put before him for the name. I well remember what name it was—it was uncommon in itself, and that and the circumstances fixed it on my mind; it was Waldgrave Winthrop."

"And did he write it?" asked Edwin breathlessly.

"Yes, he wrote it," replied Mangles, with deliberate slowness.

"Oh, heaven!" gasped the youth.

"Then, he did commit the forgery?"

"Wait a bit—I didn't say that. Through the state he was in, he was barely conscious of what he was doing; but
