"What a wonderful year this has been to us all!" Mrs. Remington exclaimed, when he had concluded his narrative. "So eventful—so full of incident and surprise!"

"Hum! so Hal Wellington turns out to be your father, youngster?" Mr. Trowbridge remarked, looking strangely moved for him, for it was rare that he presented anything but the most stoical countenance, even under the most trying circumstances. "Well, we two shavers used to have fine times together. He was always up and coming," the old man went on, musingly; "always knew the best places for chestnuts and shagbarks. Nobody knew where there were so many Nobody knew where there were so many birds' nests and squirrel holes, and everybody was sure to have good luck fishing, if Hal Wellington went along to balt the hooks. More than all that, he saved my life once."

"Is it possible?" Max cried, deeply in-

"Yes; we were out skating-it was the first of the season, and the ice wasn't first of the season, and the ice wasn't very strong. We ventured out too far, and it suddenly gave way beneath us, plunging us both into the water. I was terribly frightened and lost my head enterthing the strong strong the strong st terribly frightened and lost my head entirely; but Hal was as calm as a clock. He untied the tippet that was around his neck, threw one end to me, as I clung frantically to the ice, and took the other firmly between his teeth, while he called out, cheerily, 'Hold on, Joe, for a little, and I'll pull you out.' Then he found a place where the ice was thickest, cautiously threw out one leg over the edge, place where the ice was thickest, cauti-ously threw out one leg over the edge, and finding that it would hold, crawled back to a safe spot, then carefully pulled me after him and helped me ashore. Bless my crown! it's nearly fifty years since then. How strangely things do turn about in this world!"

The next morning they all drove to the hotel to call upon Mr. Wellington. They found him sitting up and looking much brighter than when Max had seen him the previous day, in spite of the exciting interview through which he had passed.

They spent nearly two hours with him, and Mr. Wellington was evidently much pleased with Agnes as a daughter-in-law elect, for his eyes often dwelt, with a look of undisguised admiration and satisfaction, upon her sweet face.

Max and Mrs. Remington had had a private discussion before starting out, and had decided that Mr. Wellington ought to come and make his home with them, if he could be persuaded to do so; they had ample room in their new residence, and they felt that the lonely indence, and they felt that the lonely in-valid needed the comforts of a pleasant home. He had his own valet to wait up-on him, and thus would be comparative-ly very little care to anyone else.

When this plan was proposed to Agnes nd Mr. Trowbridge, both assented to it most cordially.

Max adroitly broached the subject to his father during their call, and he appeared to be much pleased with the thoughtfulness that had suggested it. "Yes, I will come," he said, after considering the matter for a while, "after you young people get back from your wedding fourney; perhaps it will be best for me to remain her till then."

But Agnes vetoed this at once. But Agnes vetoed this at once.

"Please, Mr. Weilirgton, come right away." she urged, with her most engaging smile. "These rooms are so gloomy, hemmed in by those high stone wails;
you need the air and sunlight, of which you can have abundance if you will only come home with us. I should go away so much happier to know you were there, and I will coax Max to shorten our trip and get back to look after you as soon as possible."

"No, indeed, you will do no such thing.
I could never consent to that latter pro-

I could never consent to that latter pro-position, my dear." Mr. Wellington re-turned, with an appreciative smile. "I will accept your invitation, since you put it so kindly, but only on the condition that you will not change your plans in the least on my account."

And thus it was decided that he should henceforth form a part of their house-Mr. Trowbridge and his old-time friend—for such Mr. Wellington proved to be—experienced a great deal of pleased to forget the long stretch of time since their early experiences of bird-nest hunting and fishing, as they talked over those bygone days and boyish reminiscences.

Mrs. Remington and Mr. Wellington, too, seemed to be mutually charmed with each other.

The invalid, notwithstanding his weak-rness, showed that he was a polished gen-tleman, and, as they touched upon art, literature and other subjects congenial to both, they were not only entertained themselves, but their conversation was also interesting and instructive to their

When they finally arose to go, Mr. Wellington promised Max that if he would come for him some time the next day, he would go home with him.

Accordingly, about 11 the following morning, Max went to keep the appoint; ment, and was very much gratified to find his father still improving, while he seemed really quite joyful over the prospect of a change of life and home.

"I have a little shopping to do my son. have a little shopping to do, my son. before you drive me home; will you go with me and give me the benefit of your advice?" he asked, as they were about to enter the carriage.

Max signified his willingness to comply with his request, and then Mr. Welling-ton enlightened him regarding the charof the purchases he wished to gift from her husband's father; shall it be?" he inquired. Max laughed as he answered that that would be a rather difficult matter to decide, since, immediately after Mrs. Remington had issued cards for the mar-riage of her daughter, gifts of every de-scription had begun to pour in upon after Mrs. them at an astonishing rate.

"Never mind; I imagine that we can find something that will be suitable," his father returned.

But, as Max warned him, is was no easy matter to make a selection. He named article after article in the form of plate, household furniture and ornaments but found that he had been forestailed in almost every instance. Then he turn-ed his attention to jewels, and Max told him that Agnes had comparatively few personal ornaments, although among the recents gifts there had been some jewel-

Mr. Wellington finally decided upon pearls, and selected an elegant and com-plete set, comprising necklace, bracelets, brooch and earrings, besides a half-dozen unique little hair ornaments in the form of lilies, and suitable for arranging the veil of a bride. The set was exquisite, and Max wondered what his modest Agnes would say when she received it.

This proved to be the extent of Mr.
Wellington's "shopping," and then they drove directly home, where they found a tempting lunch awaiting them, and as the stranger took the seat assigned him, he remarked while his refined face was all aglow with exceeding happiness that he had not experienced such a feeling of reace and content for more than twenty

The wedding day of Max and Agnes dawned bright and perfect as it is possible for a day in June to be.

Grace Church, where the ceremony was to be performed, had been literally transformed into a temple of roses, for they were everywhere. The gas brackets, all around the walls, were covered with them; they dropped in masses from the magnificent chandelier overhead; the altar was covered, the chancel railing was wreathed with them; such a wealth as there was of them is rarely seen, and of all colors, though white predominated, while they were such a fitting decoration for the time of year and the occasion, and the air was literally heavy with their perfume. The wedding day of Max and Agnes

The Buffalo papers are knocking Jim Parr, the sturdy English wrestler, who has been distinguishing himself in these parts recently. Of course, Parr is a Britisher, and that in itself is a crime in Buffalo. The newspapers in question hint that Parr is digging for the Long Green, regardless of his reputation as an honest wrestler, and the ground upon which they base their accusation is the fact that Parr was thrown recently by Denny Gallagher, whose days as a wrestler have long since passed. As a matter of fact, Gallagher threw Parr fairly. He probably could not repeat the performance, but it is certain that Parr did not lie down in the Bradford match. He is built of other material.

Teams picked from the ranks of the city photographers played ball at Springbank on Wednesday. The Advertiser hasn't had the privilege of seeing the score card, but has, nevertheless, been assured that the game was a great battle. The opposing twirlers had no difficulty in locating the "plate." The batsmen of both sides, however, applied a "hypo solution" to the pitchers' curves, an expedient which caused one of the latter to exclaim: "That 'fixes' me!" The game soon became fast and furious.

"Slide," yelled the coacher. The runner did so, but the event proved he had not exposed his "lens" quickly enough. He was nipped at the second leg of the tripod. Nothing sensational "developed" the next two innings. Suddenly the pitcher who chanced to be doing the work just then, became tired of the monotony, rolled up his sleeve, "exposing" a "well-developed" arm, and made a "shot" at the "plate." Like a "flash" the opposing batsman landed on the ball. There was a terrific crash and the fans "focused" frightened glances of the flying sphere. The outfielder wasn't prepared and the ball rolled out of sight in the grass. "Can't you 'finder,' " yelled the irate captain as the runner was rapidly circling the legs of the tripod. The agitated outfielder replied in the the captain's instructions until the runner had reached home; which is "a proof" that he was a stupid fellow. Thus was the great game won and lost, and here, for the first time, is "printed" the true record of it.

THE CANADIAN DERBY. Buffalo, June 5.-When the bugle calls the horses to the post for the Canadian Derby at Fort Eric next Tuesday afternoon a field of crack-ajacks will parade past the judges' stand and the race will be worth going a long way to see. The field that will go to the post for the Fort Erie classic will likely be the largest in the history of the race and it will exceed all former Derbies in the matter of class.

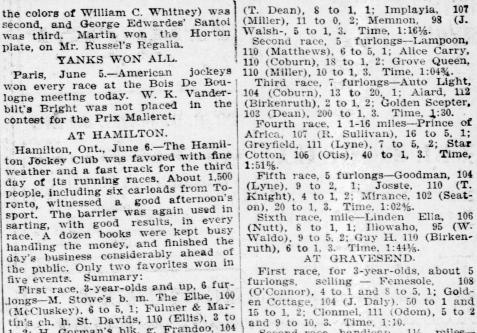

Secretary Parmer returned from St.

There are a good many horses already at the track, the string of Dan Lamasney, the Eastern owner being the most prominent. At the close of almost the entire number of horses which are taking part in that meeting will be shipped to Fort Erie by special week.

BOXING.

McCOY'S SWEEPING CHALLENGE. New York, June 4.—Kid McCoy has once more raised his voice throughout the land. His arm is evidently feeling better, for Monday night from his wayside inn, near Saratoga, he issued a proclamation. It is to the effect that he will fight any or all men, size, weight, color or price absolutely no object. He wants to fight, and is evidently looking for work, as he adds that time and place and other conditions make no difference. This blanket Big Race Tracks. challenge has only one little hold-out. McCoy bars Jeffries. Sporting men here consider McCoy's challenge more First race, 6 furlongs-Bobbaker, 107 as a joke than a serious affair, in view Aker), 7 to 1, 1; Sim W., 107 (Bonner),
