

SIDNEY DILLON.

SIDNEY DILLON.

The tall form of Mr. Dillon can be seen almost any day on Wall street, although he no longer takes an open and active part in the battles and enterprises of that great financial and speculative arena. He belongs to a generation whose active work is over, as he is more than seventy years of age; but his snowy white hair, heavy English side whiskers, and erect bearing and positive manner still render him a remarkable figure wherever he appears. From the force of habit he haunts the scene of former struggles and victories, and takes a keen interest in the operations of younger men than himself. For many years Mr. Dillon was President of the Union Pacific Railroad, to the construction of which, at a time when the scheme of a trans-continental railroad was ridiculed as wild and impossible, he bent the energies of a mind not accustomed to defeat. He has also been and still is interested in many of the enterprises of Mr. Jay Gould, with whom he has been a valued co-worker. He ranks among the rich men of to-day, and is worth millions of dollars.

Gents:—I used one Bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup, and I believe it saved my life. The neighbors all knowing how weak I was before I took the Syrup, and now want me to send and get some for them. Let me know what you will send me one dozen bottles for.

Yours truly,

SAMUEL MASON.

Not Equal to the Occasion.—“My dear, demonstrated a wife, peering out from under the bed clothes, “I do wish you would use the word ‘sheol.’ It sounds better.”

“It may sound better at times,” replied her husband, who was noisily snoring his heel, “but when a man steps on a tack he wants the old version.”
