A Transient Experience

As they came through the groups of cottages, which thickened as they neared the little church, the population turned out to watch them, lovely brown-faced children, with thick, bleached curls, tall women, with still fine faces, big old men, and in inconspicuous contrast, a young girl, with eager eyes, standing by a bicycle, from which she had evidently dismounted as the funeral approached. She had a sketchbook in her hand, and held a pencil poised, as if the sudden striking effect of the scene had found her forget to draw it.

At the gate of the little churchyard they were met by a quite modern young clergyman, who began to read the service reverently, but with a strong local accent. George followed up the narrow path, under the low door, into the smallest church he had ever seen. It was flooded through its plain windows with soft, golden light, and the interior was filled with two or three high white pews, and the little altar-table neatly covered with a plain red cloth. It was all very neat, but smaller and humbler than George had thought a church could be. There hardly seemed room for the coffin, between the altar-rail and the door. The funeral party disappeared into the pews, and George sat on a bench against the west wall. In due time they went out into the churchyard, and George stood near the open grave. On the plain slate headstones around him he read words, lichen-grown, half-effaced letters which must have belonged to his family name. Just in front of him a less ancient stone bore plainly upon it the inscription:

DANIEL GLADWYN,
Late of Moss Head,
Born 1830.
Died 1880.
The Spirit of the Lord came upon me.

Beneath the death of Elizabeth, wife of the above, was recorded as having taken place in 1815.

When the service was over he went up to the clergyman.
"I am George Daniel Gladwyn, sir," he said, "and I was coming, I think at your request, to visit my great-uncle. I am shocked to find myself too late. I have been in Norway. I suppose I missed a letter."

"Yes," I wrote again to Mrs. Gladwyn. The old lady's death was very sudden at last, a stroke. I am very glad you see here. Everything is left to you and your brother. Will you come into the vicarage and take some refreshment? Afterwards I will walk with you up to Moss Head."

When George had followed him into a smart little vicarage with pink cluster roses over its gray walls, had been introduced to his wife, who apologized for the excellent bread, butter and honey, which she set before him for tea, he asked many questions and showed such lively interest in the answers, that he had soon learned that the young vicar, Mr. Ritson, could tell him.

He himself was a new-comer, a modern person, and Lord —, the lord of the manor, had built his pretty vicarage for his modern son, who was hoping to restore the church, and had got a harmonium, and other amenities of devotion. He was educated, had been to Rossall and to St. Bees, was a testataller, and an advanced churchman, but his predecessor — he remembered him as a boy (his father, he might remark, was Lord —'s agent) — his predecessor was as rough as the shepherds around him, drank with them at the Nag's Head, was so ignorant that he offered the famous preacher, Canon Robertes, 5 shillings for his sermon, when he had preached in the little church one summer, and had then asked him to take a glass with him at the Nag's Head. And before him — so the tale went in Dan Gladwyn's days — old Pilest Westall drank and swore, and lived on porridge and potatoes, for the endowment was but £30 a year till the lord and the bishop made it up to £200 — and Dan — Dan, so the speaker's grandfather had been wont to say, was a wild lad and had all the lads and lassies at his feet. He knew how to get whisky that had never paid dues; but see him at the sports — there was such a wrestler in the county — and his eyes — old Grandfather Ritson declared, "look in his eyes and you'd follow him over Scawfell Pike. He sold Moss Head, the bit of land except for it as if it had been his soul. He was a poet, too, but his poems seemed to have perished."

At this point Mr. Ritson broke off and apologized. There were old tales, no doubt exaggerated. Mr. Gladwyn would forgive —

"Do go on," said George, with a smile and fixing his large considering eyes on the speaker.

"Well, Dan was an infidel and a

Jacobin, and he used, as I say, to drink with Priest Westall and with the lord of the manor of the day, a noted rascal, and the tale goes that they played some blasphemous trick and raised the devil on the night after the sale of Moss Head."

"How interesting!" said George, with eagerness; "what occurred?"

"That I can't say. But it's an odd fact that the tale is told, for there's so very little superstition in this country, you can hardly pick up a legend in the district. But Parson Westall, they say, went silly, and Dan Gladwyn was a changed man, and set himself to preach the gospel."

"A singular result of invoking the devil," said George.

"Yes; I won't answer for that part of the tale, Mr. Gladwyn, and I've no doubt the gospel was wanted here, though it was a pity he could not have held to the sober teachings of his church, he seemed to have mixed up his preaching with socialistic ideas, but the whole countryside ran after him; some people called him 'Daft Dan,' and thought that he was crazy, but there's no doubt he was a great power. He was only 50 when he died."

"Did my Aunt Hannah remember him?"

"I couldn't say. She never spoke of him. He was no prophet in his own family, and his sons, greatly resenting the loss of the little property, left Wadale long before his death."

"I know," said George. "My grandfather was a banker. He was a most respectable man, but he wasn't a prophet. My father was Canon of Westminster, but he wasn't, I've been told, a preacher. They rose in life."

"As for the selling of Moss Head, it only forestalled what happens in many of our families. The stock is sold, they go into professions, and, as you say, rise in life. It is my own case, though I am a long way from an canonry. But you'll like to come up to Moss Head to see the place."

Mr. Ritson conducted George to the Nag's Head, where he left his knapsack and arranged for a bedroom; and then, in the cool, damp evening went up the path by which the funeral party had come — the "cave road," as it was called, by which the dead were brought to Kirk Andrew from still more remote hillsides and valleys.

After a two mile walk they came out on the "Moss," a place of pools and grass, mingled with white moor, rushes and little pools, while the lovely "Star of Bethlehem" grew abundantly.

A little above it the gray rock broke through the fine shallow turf, and here, within low fern-grown walls, stood a little white, rough-cast house, with a slate roof and one sycamore tree growing on its leeward side. "This is Moss Head," said Mr. Ritson. "A man named Richardson rents it now from Lord —, and there, pointing to a group of still smaller cottages, is where old Miss Gladwyn lived and died. Shall we go there?"

George assented. He felt more intensely interested than he had ever been before.

The lower floor of the cottage consisted of a large stone kitchen, or "houseplace," with a great open hearth, on which a great peat fire was burning. It was a roomy place, with homely furniture, but of course to George's eyes, it was a strangely humble place for one of his own kin.

A quiet, homely woman received them. She was Mrs. Fletcher — Miss Hannah Gladwyn's mother had been a Fletcher — and she claimed some distant cousinship. She looked hard at George, and said "Ay, indeed!" with some curiosity when he was named to her. She said that "Daft Dan" had spoken of her great-nephews, and had left a few things to be delivered over to them in case of her sudden death.

"My aunt was not in want?" said George, as Mrs. Fletcher climbed up the narrow staircase in search of the legacy.

"No," said Mr. Ritson. "You know, a small annuity was bought for her by her brothers, and these bits of furniture were all her own."

Mrs. Fletcher came heavily down again with an old cedar box containing papers, an old Bible and a small oil picture without a frame, the portrait of a man with long, abundant hair falling on his shoulders, rugged features, and large, somewhat wild eyes.

Her cousin Hannah, Mrs. Fletcher said, had told her only last week that she meant to make her will. The papers and the family Bible, and her father's portrait were to be handed over to her great-nephews, the furniture she meant her cousin to have.

Anderson appeared with his usual demeanor. His brother, who came up from the east, was also present. The principal points up to the time of sending this were the number of persons who knew of the larceny and who had access to the vault, the amount of money kept there, the amount the teller usually kept in his box, and the amount of Dominion notes generally kept on hand. McBeth, who was accountant here last October, told what he knew about the foregoing.

A gang of tramps was arrested by the Hull police some time ago, and Chief Genest believed from the records of the fellows that they might be the bank robbers. BIG BRUSH FIRE IN KENT COUNTY

Three Hundred Men Engaged in Extinguishing the Flames—Serious Loss Estimated.

Chatham, Ont., Aug. 17.—A large brush fire is raging on con. 11, Chatham township. It started last Friday in a field where men were clearing up the land, and spread to lot 7. From there it spread to lots 7 and 8. The strong wind of the past few days has helped considerably to fan and spread the flames. A force of about 300 men has been fighting the fire for the last two days, and have it about under control. Two frame dwelling houses have been burned, but their household effects were saved. The continued dry weather is the cause of the fire. Yesterday afternoon fire totally destroyed the barns and crops of Horace Black, con. 5, Raleigh. A strong east wind was blowing at the time, and it helped considerably to spread the flames. Three barns were burned with all his season's crops and all the implements. Mr. Black had only threshed a week ago, and had the finest crops in the section. His loss is about $8,000, with $3,000 insurance.

LARGE FIRE IN LUCAN.

Lucan, Ont., Aug. 17.—Tuesday night fire started in the hotel stables of P. McDevitt. The fire company responded promptly, and in a very few minutes had three streams of water pouring into the flames. The progress of the fire had been so rapid that they could not save the buildings, but kept the flames from spreading to the hotel. McDevitt got all his horses out. He lost $2,000 on contents. The building is owned by Thomas Todd, of St. Helen's, and insured for $500.

A BRAVE WOMAN.

How a Drunken Husband Was Made a Sober Man by a Determined Wife.

A PATHETIC LETTER. She writes: "I had for a long time been thinking of trying the Samaria Prescription treatment on my husband for his drinking habits, but I was afraid he would discover that I was giving him medicine, and the thought unnerved me. I hesitated for nearly a week, but one day when he came home very much intoxicated and his week's salary nearly all spent, I threw off all fear and determined to make an effort to save our home from the ruin I saw coming, at all hazards. I sent for my Samaria Prescription, and put it in his coffee as directed next morning and watched and prayed for the result. At noon I gave him more and also at supper. He never suspected a thing, and I then boldly kept on giving it regularly, as I had discovered something that set my nerve in my body tingling with hope and happiness, and I could see a bright future ahead of me before me—a peaceful, happy home, a share in the good things of life, an attentive, loving husband, contented, and everything else dear to a woman's heart, for my husband had told me that whiskey was vile stuff and he was taking a dislike to it. He was only too true, for before I had given him the full course he had stopped drinking altogether, but I kept giving the medicine till it was gone, and then sent for another lot to have on hand if he should relapse, as he had done from his promises before. He told me, 'I am writing you this letter to tell you how thankful I am. I honestly believe it will cure the worst cases.'"

A pamphlet in plain, sealed envelope, sent free, giving full particulars and full information with directions how to order, administer Samaria Prescription. Correspondence considered strictly confidential. Address The Samaria Remedy Co., Jordan street, Toronto, Ont.

ARE YOU WEAK, PALE OR NERVOUS?

DIAGNOSE YOUR OWN CASE.

While it is true that nervousness often occurs as a primary affection, in many instances it is but secondary to other troubles. Thus any disorder of the digestive system—the stomach, liver, bowels, etc., nearly always is attended by nervous symptoms. In no class of diseases, however, is nervousness so marked as in those diseases that relate to the delicate organization of women.

DISEASES OF WOMEN are always attended by symptoms that are entirely remote from the seat of disorder. Paleness, weakness, nervousness, are often experienced long before the true character of the disease is discovered. Headaches, Scurvy, Cheeks, Palpitation of the Heart, Impaired Digestion, Torpid Liver and Costiveness are all prominent symptoms that attend those ailments peculiar to women, symptoms that may mislead until disease is firmly established.

Dr. Arnold's English Pills for weak people readily correct the above symptoms, whether they occur as primary affections or whether they are secondary to female disorders. They are the best remedy ever devised for the relief and cure of suffering women, for they give strength and tone to the delicate organs. They correct all ailments, heal ulceration, and chronic inflammation, and permanently overcome all the distressing nervous symptoms that attend those functional and organic diseases of women.

They impart strength to the whole system, and insure a regular discharge of every bodily function. They give the glow of health to all pale or sallow complexions. They are pronounced by medical men to possess most wonderful curative properties, and they are certainly a boon to all suffering women.

They are a positive cure for all those conditions that result in inflammation, ulceration and falling of the womb, and other uterine displacements. They have been tried and tested, and will cure.

They are for sale by all druggists at the small price, as in England, viz., 25 shillings (75 cents) per box, small box 1 shilling (25 cents). If your druggist does not keep them, send to S. Bassett & Co., agents, Toronto, Ont.
