"She is a widow."

"A—ah!" A long sigh of relief came from the old man. He comprehended at once the fact of the girl's being a widow being favorable to him. He murmured to himself, "She will not think it so strange of me."

"What do you think of it?" he asked of his intended brother-in-law "I have nothing to do with it," murmured Hill.

"Yes, you can do so much for me, my lad," returned old Turcan softly. "As her brother you can put what I want of her before her. **Not married."

A look of unmistakable relief came over the old man's face. "Do you think," said he, laying his hands on the younger man's shoulders "do you think she would marry me?" Hill fell back a pace or two; he saw the old man was in earnest. "You said, Give a woman a chance." Will she take the chance if I give it to her?"

The matter was becoming complicated.

ASH, "You said she had knewn trouble." went on old Turcan quickly, "that you had been unlucky and unable to do all you would for her. I take it, my lad, she is not so comfortable that she would not think of coming out to this coast, though it is so lonely, and to me who have been more so—speak, man, won't yeu?" and he shook Hill hard.

"How can I tell?" What d've mean.

"How ca

The more he considered his scheme the more feasible it looked. It was roughled to himself from the old man's grip.
