Selected Literature.
REUBEN CAGGS' THEORY.
A STORY OF LIFE IN A GREAT CITY.
(George H. Heyworth in Independent.) I was sitting in a cafe below Fourteenth street with my friend Reuben Caggs. It was a sultry July day, and he ought to have been at his country house on Long Island, where he had invited me to spend a couple of weeks. He was however, a heavy smoker, and he thought it safer to keep his middle finger on the pulse of Wall street than to be driving a pauk and listening to the rolling and roaring surf.
Caggs was said to be many times a millionaire. Exactly what that term signifies, I can't explain; for my multiplication table ends long before it reaches six figures. I have never stood in the shoes of such a man, and never looked at life through his eyes. I don't know what it means to be worried over the size of one's surplus, or to be hated because one has a couple of fortunes in the bank not drawing a cent of interest.
If I manage to make both ends meet on the first of January, and can face the new year of debt, having given the usual half dollar to the elevator boy who takes me to my room at old times of night, and a bright sixpence to the old lady who brings me my morning and evening papers, I consider myself fortunate.
But to have so much money that one can't count it even in his dreams, to be pointed at on the sidewalk as Jabez Greaves, Esq., who has 17 horses in his stable, and a box at the opera—well, that is the kind of life my friend Caggs led, and, on the whole, he seemed to enjoy it.
