The crisis is one which, if ever, a man should be a law unto himself, must hold the balance true and do his duty both to himself and to the women who are involved in the case. The vital question appears to be: What is that duty, and how best is it to be performed?

Certainly, no man has any business to ask a woman to marry him unless he makes the offer with the full purpose and earnest desire to carry it out to the utmost of his ability; meaning to make her his wife: this is a fact which cannot be too strenuously insisted upon. That the man may change his mind is possible, but this possibility has nothing which has not been desired to with his obligations after the fact. He has no right to do anything of the sort; it is his bounded of anything of the sort; it is his bounded of anything of the sort; it is his bounded of anything of the sort; it is his bounded of anything of the sort; it is his bounded of the control of the

Doubtless it is for this reason that, excepting for the sting of his vanity, it does a man no serious harm to be pilted, even at the church door; while for a woman to be thrown over by the man who has asked her to marry him is scarcely short of disgrace ful. Indieed, to be jilted, even at the church door; while for a woman to whome his sengged to release him from the engagement. It is many times easier for a woman to break off an engagement than for a man to do so; but, however difficult the sixtu ation, it may be better to arow the mistake than to try to ignore it. When the man feels that, instead of drawing closes, he is drifting farther and farther when the ease when here were will be able to do the things we desire.
