A full account of the methods employed is given in "Surgery at a Casualty Clearing Station," which is an intensely interesting book even for the lay reader.

Practical tests have shown there are four distinct classes of blood, distinguished according to their coagulating properties. The bind of blood may kill. But when the right kind is injected the dying man returns to life.

"Many cases of severe loss of blood hitherto considered as inoperable, and others as exceedingly bad surgical risks, may often be revived to a degree which insures a good prospect of ultimate recovery . Again, where an operation has been performed and there has been great shock, blood
