There is something of irony in the fact | that one of the most immediately suc-cessful church works ever produced should have reached the green old age of should have reached the green old age of threescore and ten years before being hard in a progressive city like London. On the occasion of a first production, then, it may be of interest to know that the "Stabat Mater" is a religious prose poem, by Jacobus de Benedictis, written toward the close of the thirteenth century, and is one of the finest examples extant of mediaeval Latin composition. Its popularity among ecclesiastics and * extant of mediaeval Latin composition.

Its popularity among ecclesiastics and composers alike has gained for it a permanent place in the Catholic Church service, a setting of it being regularly sung between the epistle and the gospel at high mass on the third Sunday in September, and on Friday in Passion week; or, divided into three sections, as office hymns on those days. In England and on the continent. Its separate stanzas are often interposed between the fourteen stations of the cross. Joequin, Palestrina, Pergolesi, Hayon and Astorga have written six of the finest settings known, Palestrina being the composer of two. For religious inspiration these works of bygone days have never been surpassed, nor their posi-tion disputed. Rossini was a skeptic, and that fact, together with the sensuous beauty of his "Stabat Mater" is respon-sible for much of the criticism as to its
