

THE HEAVENS IN MAY

BY PROF. DOOLITTLE,
Astronomer of the University of Pennsylvania

The sun in its yearly journey among the stars has now reached a point so far north of the celestial equator that it rises far in the northeast and sets in the northwest. Consequently we now enjoy the long and pleasant twilight of summer, and not until a comparatively late hour of the night does the sky become black enough for the fainter constellations to be seen. To most observers the most interesting part of the sky during this month is the region which lies low down in the west immediately after sunset. The bright stars of winter still linger here, while among them the three bright planets, Jupiter, Mars and Venus will be seen, the first two growing perceptibly fainter as the month goes on, but the last increasing very greatly in brightness and moving very swiftly toward the east among the stars.

Toward the east and south the heavens are covered with dense stars, forming beautiful and delicate groups which are no less interesting than the more striking constellations to the west. There is no better month for tracing out the two long constellations of the Dragon and the Water Snake, while Bootes, or the Great Bear, nearly overhead that it is in excellent position for examination. The brilliant blue star Vega, which a few months ago sank from view in the northwest, is again appearing in the northeast. This beautiful star, the arc light of the heavens, is a summer star; it remains in the early evening sky only during the warm nights of summer. By next August, it will be almost exactly overhead, but as the winter months approach it will again sink to the ground in the west.

With the help of Fig. 1, the observer can trace out the great constellation Hydra, or the Water Snake, which stretches all the way across the sky from the Scorpion to the Lesser Dog, an ill-omened constellation which has come down to us from a remote antiquity. Just above the Hydra are two little known groups known as Corvus, or the Crow, and Crater, or the Cup. According to the legend, the Crow being sent by Apollo for a cup of water lilted after it, and until the fruit became ripe and then returned with a water snake in its claws, blaming the snake for the delay of its delay. In punishment he is fixed in the sky with the cup near, but is forever prevented by the snake from drinking from it. From this rather unpleasant legend the constellation has at different times received other names. The Fig Bird, and the Litterer, for example, and the early folk-lore it was stated that this bird alone never carried water to her young. The star at A was formerly the brightest star of the group, and the one at B was next to it in brightness. These stars are now much fainter than either of the stars at C or D. The star C is a beautiful double, the companion being of the eighth magnitude and of a purple color. The star at B in Crater, also has several faint companions near.

the one brilliant star Spica, at S, which represents an ear of wheat which the Virgin is holding in her hand. As the years go by the sun will move along the path M N, crossing the celestial equator on the 21st September, and passing entirely through the constellation of the Virgin. According to Greek tradition the Sphinx was constructed, with the enough for the other stars to be seen. At the beginning of May the planet is seen for only about an hour after sunset. As the month goes on it mounts up very rapidly in the sky, until by May 31 it will have reached the constellation Gemini, Fig. 1, and will not then set until after 9 o'clock. During the entire summer and autumn, this planet will remain with us, continually increasing in brightness until next October.

A part of Fig. 1 is drawn on a larger scale in Fig. 2. If the observer will look toward the west soon after sunset he will at once recognize the two planets, Jupiter and Venus, by their great brightness. As the sky grows darker, he will distinguish the brilliant Aldebaran, the brightest star of the Hyades, and soon afterward, as the sunset glow dies away, the Pleiades and the fainter stars of the Hyades will be clearly visible. Midway between these two groups will be seen the little red planet Mars.

The motions of the three planets during the month will present a most interesting spectacle. As shown by Fig. 2, they are all moving eastward but at very different speeds. Thus Venus will overtake Mars on the morning of May 11, and Jupiter on the evening of May 11, and Neptune on June 2, while Mars will overtake Jupiter on May 18. The observer should not fail to examine Venus and Mars with a telescope on May 11. They will then be so close together that to the naked eye they will seem to touch each other; in the telescope they will appear as shown in Fig. 3, Venus being the larger and brighter. This will afford an excellent opportunity for comparing their colors and brightness. Similarly Venus and Jupiter may be seen together with a small telescope on May 11, Venus then being 1 degree and 11 minutes north of Jupiter. They will then appear as shown in Fig. 4.

The other planets are now morning stars, and cannot be seen in the early evening. ERIC DOOLITTLE.

When tired of the day and even lingers more than half the night.

The form of the group is such, however, that it rises much more rapidly. The risings and settings of this constellation were made much of in classical days. Hesiod wrote:

"When in the rosy morn Aeternus shines
Then pluck the clusters from the parent vines."

The bright yellow star Aeternus is at R. Each of the stars marked T is a double star.

The observer will have no difficulty in tracing out the beautiful Northern Crown, east of Bootes, nor the long constellation of the Serpent, directly below, while exactly overhead the Great Dipper now shines out, the brightest constellation of the sky.

During the month of April a most brilliant star may have been noticed shining out low down in the west, just after sunset. This is the planet Venus, which is bright that it is easily visible long before the sky grows black

British Columbia's Rare Opportunity

New York Sun.
The usual plan of city building is to let the place grow as it will. A single building or a single street becomes a nucleus from which there spreads and sprays first a village, then a town, and at last a city. The result is almost invariably a nightmare of streets and alleys, lined with a mixture of hovels and palaces, shacks and skyscrapers. In time the architectural evils are in some measure corrected, but a model city must begin at the beginning. Opportunities of this kind rarely come nowadays. Before they may that their town will one day be a large metropolis, townsmen rarely make any provision for the coming greatness. Canada has one of these rare opportunities. She has a chance to build a model city. The western terminus of the new Grand Trunk Pacific line from ocean to ocean will be at a place Prince Rupert. The new railway is a national enterprise, and as such the Dominion government has practically full control of the plans for the new city at its western end. Its location is some four hundred miles north of the present city of Vancouver, not far from the mouth of the Skeena river, and only a short distance from the southward projection of Alaska. The region is now practically a wilderness, and Canada has a chance to build a city as it should be. She can lay out broad streets, plan sewer systems, provide for ample parks, reserve suitable spots for public buildings and impose restrictions upon the class of structures to be erected in particular districts. The growth of Vancouver has been hampered by the competition of Seattle and Tacoma have not been without influence on its development. Prince Rupert may little likely to have any rival in its neighborhood. It should be built with an eye to what it will be a hundred years from today. It would be well worth while to make a long trip to see a place of that kind.

which is now handling all the cargo which is given to it.
Mr. Cook stated that all arrangements for perfecting the service had been completed and that if possible the service would be opened before December 1.
Two of the new steamers which were building in San Francisco were intended for the Pacific side and would have run between Seattle and the isthmus. The loss of these vessels will not, however, according to Mr. Cook, interfere with the inauguration of the service, as these vessels were to have been made use of when the freight became too heavy for the smaller liners to handle it all.

Consumption is a Germ Disease. How Can It Start With a Cold?

This is a reasonable question and one that must arise to the mind of almost everyone when the claim is made that consumption starts with a cold. The cold simply prepares the system for the reception and development of germs of that disease, that would not otherwise have found lodgment. It is the same with diphtheria, scarlet fever and measles. They are just likely to be contracted when the child has a cold. That is why a cold should never be neglected. The longer it hangs on the greater the danger. As a quick cure for colds Chamberlain's Cough Remedy can always be relied upon. Its remarkable cures have won for it a world wide reputation and an immense sale. It is pleasant and safe to take. For sale by all druggists.

WILL NOT DELAY.

All preparations for opening the service between Seattle and New York, via the isthmus of Tehuantepec, is being rushed. C. W. Cook, agent of the line in Seattle, stated recently that the loss of the vessels being built for the company in San Francisco would have no effect whatever upon the new service, and that the ships would start the regular service between Seattle and Salinas Cruz, on the Pacific side, and New York and Constantinople, on the Atlantic side. The freight carried by the different vessels will be transferred across the isthmus by the new railroad line which has just been put in shape and

When City Talks With Distant City

Conversing Halfway Across the Continent as Easy for the Telephone User as Chatting With a Neighbor—Very Different Thing, However, for the Folks at "Central"—Dozen Operators and Six or Eight Switchboards Required.

TO the hustling American business man who lifts the receiver from his desk telephone and closes a $20,000 deal in a city 500 miles away without moving from his chair and in the space of scarcely five minutes' time, the long distance telephone is one of the marvels of the twentieth century. As a matter of fact, there is no more remarkable industry than that which combines mechanical perfection with human skill, enables us to speak with each other from places so far apart that mountains, rivers and great cities intervene.

Talking halfway across the continent is as easy for the telephone user as chatting with a neighbor around the corner, but the means he employs in the two cases are quite different. An inter-distance has its own separate establishment. The busiest long distance wires in the world, among those of considerable length, are the ones over which Boston and New York talk with each other between 800 and 900 times every 24 hours. There are more conversations over the New York-Philadelphia line—very many more; but that is only 90 miles long. There are conversations over much greater distances, too, with Washington, Chicago, St. Louis, Omaha and many other of the 33,000 and odd communities the Bell system touches; but these are, naturally, fewer in number. Still, the New York business is only a part of the traffic of the long distance office here, through which also pass, daily, upwards of a thousand conversations with Providence, the capital of the individual you wish to speak to, and so on, the recording operator sends it across the room to where the actual working of the long distance wires is done. Here are the line operators—eight or ten of them—and the line connecting board, the latter being the apparatus for joining the local and long distance wires into one continuous circuit. The line operator is the important functionary who first comes in contact with the person at the distant city, the New Yorker, to his telephone and has him "brought into" the corresponding switchboard at his end of the line, and finally has two switchboards directly connected with each other by the toll wires between the cities.

The line operators in Boston and New York work in pairs, as partners. The "trunks" by means of which they reach their connecting boards—a trunk being a circuit used only for connecting two exchange offices or switchboards—have corresponding numbers in both cities. As soon as your call gets to the Boston line operator she reserves for your use a trunk to the connecting board, and tells her New York mate its number. The corresponding number of the person you are after, and his telephone number. By pressing a call the two girls can talk together over a circuit reserved for passing orders, so that a stray second is lost anywhere.

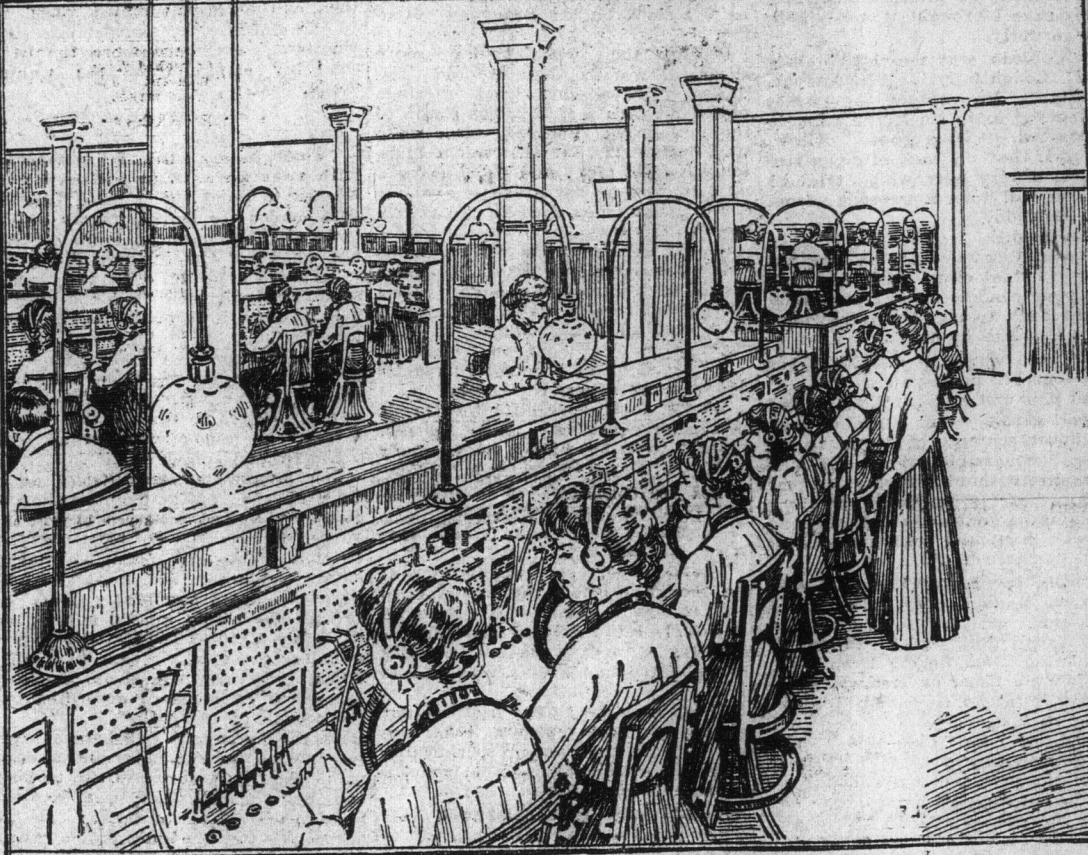

Over in New York, the line operator calls your man up through the special operator in his local central. When he is already in talk with you she brings his circuit into the connecting board with a trunk of the same number as that used at this end of the line. This lights a tiny incandescent lamp in the connecting board and the operator there joins the trunk to one of the long distance circuits, just as any two lines on any switchboard are joined, by means of a wire "cord" with a metal "plug" on either end. Even while she is doing this she telegraphs Boston the numbers of all the wires she is using, tapping them out on the Morse key on which her fingers are always resting. "Boston" throws the corresponding circuit cuts together and rings your bell and "conversation is established," as the telephone men say.

When once you begin talking, "Long Distance" steps out of the affair until either you or your friend hangs up the telephone. The little signal lamps in her switchboard for any sign that her assistance is needed, and she is instantly at your service if you want her; but in the perfected Bell apparatus of today she seldom has to speak with you except in answer to your signal. Your New Yorker, too, has his operator within call all the time; and as long as your conversation lasts, the 500 miles of copper required for each circuit between the Hub and Gotham, with all the intricate connecting apparatus, is exclusively yours.

The method of making long distance calls from cities so close together, for example, Boston and New York—is necessarily a little different. If you by joining a series of lines between two places on the way "in tandem," naturally, the volume of business between them and the western metropolis is not sufficient to keep through wires profitably engaged all the time, but by connecting the circuit from here to Buffalo, from there to Manchester, and thence to Chicago, you can get a direct "long haul" line whenever it is needed, leaving the wires free for "short haul" business at other times.
