An Italian Epidemic. The Lancet narrates a remarkable ground of a fraudulent contract? The Lancet narrates a remarkable nervous epidemic which has broken out in one of the valleys of the Italian Alps. The people of the valley are so remote from the outer world that they are still, it seems, steeped in medieval notions. It is such a pleasant spot to live in that intermarriage is described as the rule, and idiocy, deafmutism, epilepsy, suicide, and other forms of mental derangement are extremely common. In such a population the soil is prepared in which extravagant motion can flourish into frenzy. After the prologged drought of Echymary last a may be unable to eat a bit." THE NUN OF KENMARE'S FAITH. Her Remarkable Account of a Visit to the Shri at Knock. (From the London Morning Post.)

SIR,—As a paragraph has got into many papers with an incorrect account of my visit to Knock, I beg your kind insertion of the following. Such reports, from whatever source they emanate, do incalculable harm, as they throw discredit on real whatever source they emanate, do incalculable harm, as they throw discredit on real miracles. The facts are simply as follows: I obtained permission to visit Kneck, as Archdeacon Cavanagh was anxious that I should found a convent there if possible. I went there accompanied by the chaplain of the Kenmare convent. I neither asked for, wished for, nor expected a miraculous cure. In fact, I may say truly the idea never crossed my mind. For the last four years I have been unable to kneel down for one instant. even to receive the holy comne instant, even to receive the holy comne instant, even to receive the not consumer in the consequence of acute rheumatism. On approaching the place where the blessed nother of God is said to have appeared I mother of God is said to have appeared I knelt instinctively, and on rising in a few moment I found I was perfectly cured of this long-standing malady. Both Archdeacon Cavanagh and my confessor, the Rev. Neligan, C. C., of Kenmare, were present. How far this may be termed a present of the coelesiastical to collection of the coelesiastical. miraculous cure I leave it to ecclesiastical authority to decide. Probably, however, it is only one of those cures for which the recipient must thank God, but which could not be accepted by ecclesiastical authority for the confirmation of a devotion. Yours
