

Editorials.

Once again the Session opens with a sound of enthusiasm and preparation for the winter's work. The work in the summer mission fields is over and those who were out come thronging back to College with many a jest and many an adventure to tell. And with many a thought, too, of which perhaps they make no mention, for those months of practical labor have been a foretaste of the life work soon to begin, and their experiences suggest, therefore, hopes and fears and expectations and joys.

However, the summer lies behind us, and we think rather of the work of the Session which now begins.

And which begins so auspiciously, for we find that the renovation of the College building, begun last year, has been carried to completion. The result is all that could be wished. It is especially evident in the Morrice Hall, where the electric light and the re-decoration of the walls have improved things wonderfully. With this change in our surroundings, came others in our midst. Old faces are gone, and this, from a College point of view, we regret, though they go to do the work they prepared themselves for, and now add themselves to our loyal army of graduates. But others have taken their places, and these we welcome most heartily, and trust they will speedily find themselves at home among us.

And now a word, gentle reader, touching our hopes and plans for the "Journal." We do not propose to make any radical departure from the forms so well executed by those who went before us in office, and our sincere hope as editors, is that you, who have learned to like the "Journal" in the past, may give it this winter a place in your esteem; no effort on our part shall be wanting to achieve that result.

Prof. Campbell will again contribute "Talks on Books,"
