

IPECAC.—Ipecac is a vaso-motor stimulant in proper doses. The pure root, powdered, in half-grain doses, raises blood-pressure and causes constriction of the systemic arterioles and capillaries, especially of the mucous membranes. It is a noted remedy in catarrh of the stomach, of large and small intestines, of the bronchial tract, and probably of the bile-ducts. This vaso-motor property of the medication is noted in relieving headaches of the congestive kind, also those that arise from catarrh of the gastro-intestinal mucous membranes and the peculiar condition known as "biliousness." It is a remarkable medicament in all these catarrhal states, and I may here observe that much of the hepatic congestion and engorgement and biliousness are closely related to gastro-intestinal catarrh. No single remedy, administered with skill, is capable of accomplishing so much good results in all these conditions as ipecac. Rutherford's experiments prove that ipecac is a marked hepatic stimulant; he classed it high as a cholagogue—a liver tonic—that is, it stimulates the liver cells to performance of their physiological function, the secretion of bile and depuration. Possibly ipecac has more or less influence over the glycogenic of the liver; cases are numerous of glycosuria in which small doses of ipecac have reduced the daily excretion of sugar; some have been cured by it. Considered as an alternative—using the term in a special sense as indicating control over glandular
