

When he learnt that William had actually left, he turned white with rage, but it had no more effect than King John's crying at Runnymede. He had still reserved enough common sense to know that he had better be moving and no time was to be lost. But a marvellous providence protected our hero. The "Brill," William's ship, heading the fleet with the regular armaments, left the Hague, with the device that meant no guns hoisted to the masthead, the talismanic words, "I will make up the liberties of England and the Protestant religion." They were driven back by the storm and again put to sea. This time with a good fresh breeze, they sailed majestically down the English Channel. It was providential that the breeze that carried William's fleet down the Channel prevented James from leaving the Thames. Could those varying winds be attributed to accident? For James had still his faithful adherents and it was to them he looked to help him to secure his crown again. His followers were known by the name of Jacobites.
