

They have not even deigned to satisfy the extreme anxiety of the public, by any of those short statements of facts, by which it has been the established practice to give, in the Gazette, the substance of important intelligence, whenever it has not been thought safe to publish the dispatches.

" The form and nature of the court appointed to inquire into the convention of Cintra, and the manner in which the case was there brought forward, have also abundantly proved, that it was the intention of ministers to keep back every information that might connect their own conduct with the proceedings of the generals, or in any way implicate the king's government, in the transactions carried on under their instructions.

" Had their object really been, according to the gracious intentions expressed in his Majesty's royal warrant, to have instituted earnestly, and with good faith, a fair and full