Maclaren met Mr. Heinz, the millionaire pickle maker. Mr. Heinz told him that no part of his advertising brought in such returns in proportion to the expenditure as the periodical conventions of his employes. His saiesmen from all over got together often and talked about how to sell pickles. That was why Mr. Heinz believed so strongly in the Sunday school convention.

The outlook of all who had attended the convention had been widened. "The first great object of the convention was to arouse a great missionary spirit in the Sunday schools," said Justice Maclaren. "I believe there will be much leaved to the control of the convention will be much leaved by Lord Salisbury, but in the Sunday schools," said Justice Maclaren.
