Kaiser Gets Noted Hotel Man To Run His Household and Check Wholesale Thievery 'Below Stairs'—Some Austrian Matters

(Copyright, 1914, by the Brentwood Company.)

Emperor William has once again given a striking illustration of that modernity which is blended unquely with the medieval and mystic sides of his interesting character, by entrusting to Conrad Uhl, one of the most widely known Bonifaces of Europe, the task of entering for his entire household. Conrad Uhl, a Bavarian by birth, and a captain of infantry on the reserve list of the Bavarian army, is known to nearly every American or Canadian who has ever visited Berlin, as the owner of the Hotel Adlon.

Among all the hotel-keepers of Germany, he is perhaps the most successful, and assuredly the one most up to date. The household of an emperor, or of a king, has much analogy with a big hotel. Even in ordinary times the number of persons whose rank and status entitle them to be fed at the expense of Emperor William, averages from eight hundred to a thousand in a single day, while this number is even doubled and trebled when on such occasions as the wedding of the Kaiser's only daughter to the sovereign Duke of Brunswick. Then he is called upon to extend his hospitality to a whole contingent of reigning sovereigns such as the Czar, King George of Great Britain, the Kings of Saxony, Wurtemberg and Bavaria, each of whom brings a perfect army of retainers of high and low degree in his train.

They, too, there are the court balls during the winter season, where the number of guests who have to be provided with supper, ranges from four to even six thousand, at a single function.

During the reign of the late Emperor William, who was a man of most simple and abstemious tastes, the waste and robbery to which he was subjected in this connection, was something inconceivable, but was in keeping with the system that prevailed at the courts of Vienna and St. Petersburg, and at that of Queen Victoria, the loss in each case amounting, through dishonesty and waste, to fifty and even sixty per cent. A few years after the accession of the present Kaiser to the throne, he endeavored to put a stop to all this pilfering, for it is difficult to call it by any other name, and he insisted upon certain rates of expenditure being observed by the comptroller of his household, demanding that the meals of himself, the members of his family, his guests, and those of the dignitaries of the court who take their meals at the palace, should not exceed $8 a day on ordinary occasions and $10 a head in exceptional times, to be kept under $1 a day. This sum did not include wine, liquors or cigars, but merely the actual food and fruits on ordinary occasions, as much as ten and fifteen dollars a cover being allowed for state banquets.

While this had the effect of diminishing—but not abolishing—the waste and thievery, to a considerable extent, it affected injuriously the quality of the cuisine.

Realizing this, and thoroughly dissatisfied, the Emperor took the occasion of the recent retirement of old Count August Eulenburg, who had been the grand master and supreme comptroller of his court ever since his accession, to consult the count's successor, Baron Hugo von Reischach, about the matter and at his suggestion called into council Conrad Uhl, as the most capable Boniface within the length and breadth of the German empire.

Uhl was invited by the Kaiser to institute a most searching investigation of all the conditions of what may be described as "life below stairs," in the imperial palaces, and to make use of his experience as a successful hotel manager, to report on the possibilities of increasing the efficiency and quality, while reducing the cost, and abolishing the transparent abuses which had resisted all the efforts of the monarch to eradicate.

The report of Uhl was of such a startling character, showed such untoward results, and was so completely in accord with the imperial palate and purse, that the Kaiser, realizing that it was hopeless to expect any of his court officials to accomplish the work of cleaning out the Augean stable requested Uhl to undertake it, and to assume the entire charge of the feeding of the reigning family, of their guests, of the dignitaries of the court, and of their retainers of every class and degree, running the entire business on hotel lines.

Conrad Uhl, who is a very rich man, has accepted the task.

The question naturally arises, what inducements have been offered to him to undertake this task, seeing that he is already possessed of a very large fortune? The answer is, that if he had driven the other possessor of several orders of knighthood, it may safely be taken for granted that his reward will take the form of elevation to the nobility for himself and family.

To what extent the late Archduke Francis Ferdinand was at daggers drawn with the other princes of the sovereign house of Hapsburg, is strikingly shown by the fact that his death under such shocking circumstances has been immediately followed by the reappointment to active command in the army, of all those archdukes who had been driven to resign them, by his hostility. Even Archduke Francis Salvator, husband of the Emperor's youngest and favorite daughter, Valerie, and who with his wife and children makes his home with the aged monarch at Schonbrunn and at Ischl, had been forced by the animosity of the late Francis Ferdinand to give up the command of the military district of the metropolis, and of the Vienna garrison. As inspector general of all the armed forces of the Dual Empire, the late archduke exercised a virtual control of the administration of the army which, during the periodical illness of the venerable sovereign, was without any restrictions on the part of the latter.

Archduke Francis Salvator's restoration to his command, since the tragedy at Serajevo, has been followed by the reappointment of the immensely tall Archduke Eugene, brother of the Queen dowager Marie Christine of Spain, and grand master of the Teutonic Order. He is the most stately royal prince in Europe, his stature of six feet four being enhanced on state occasions by the striking costume of the ancient order of which he is the chief. The habit is white, with a Greek black cross on the long white coat hanging from the shoulders.

The late Archduke Francis Ferdinand may be said to have added insult to injury by intimating through the Vienna "Reichspost," his acknowledged organ of the press, that if he had driven the other archdukes to resign their commands, it was because of their lack of military capacity. That they should have been all restored during the last fortnight or three weeks to active roles in the army shows that the emperor does not share the views of his murdered nephew, in whose place as inspector general of the army, and as his own alter ego in the supreme command, he has appointed Archduke Frederick the one member of the reigning house with whom the late heir presumptive was on terms of most bitter enmity.
