FOSTER ON TARTE.

to Hide Behind the French-Canadians Whose Leyalty He Had Maligned.

On Monday evening, Mr. Foster,

speaking at a great public meeting in Ottawa, referred to Mr. Tarte's speech of the previous Saturday at St. Vincent de Paul. Mr. Foster is thus reported: Mr. Foster had something to say of Mr. Tarte. That gentleman had been called a bold man. "I will go further than that," said Hon. Mr. Foster. "Mr. Tarte is the biggest coward in the country. I have respect for a man that stands by his sentiments and is willing to take the punishment inflicted on him by the public. Does Tarte do it? He has taken a position position criticized by the English Irish, Scotch. What does he do? He tries to hide beneath the mantle of two million French-Canadians and to them he shouts that the whipping of criticism is not for him, but for all Frenchmen. If Mr. Tarte thinks it wrong for Canada to assist England in the Transvaal, when he is hauled over the coals, let him cease to drag with him the two million French-Canadians of Quebec, which he is doing today.

He's a coward because he vould make bis personal condemnation a maligna-

tion of his race." BOURASSA ONLY SUPPORTING

HIS LEADER. 'Mr. Bourassa had now resigned. In the stand he had taken the ex-member for Labelle was only supporting the original stand of his leader, who since had swung completely around. In a few weeks would hir. Tarte be on hand to urge the electors of Labele to vote against Mr. Bourassa as an opponent of the government. Then there was Sir Louis Davies. A short time ago he had raised his voice in cadences before the chamber of commerce in London, declaring before the empire that Canada would take a part in battling for the old flag, and ten thousand men would be forthcoming if necessary. Down at St. Vincent de Paul the master of the administration, Mr. Tarte, was waving a document before the electors and declaring that the sending of Canadian troops to the Transvaal was a precedent that would not occur again until Cana resented in the British parliament Had those disunited members met since? He remembered the old cabinet when seven ministers left. hadn't heard of any one leaving this cabinet. When Sir Louis and Tarte met, how were they going to reconcile matters? Dr. Borden, down at Quebec, in an after dinner speech, would have Canada fighting the whole world. Mr Tarte at St. Vincent de Paul, says

"I want a word to go to Mr. Laurier," said Mr. Foster," that if there is something behind that the people don't know, he had better take them into his confidence, instead of allowing one of his ministers to go splut-tering around with cabinet documents. Sir Louis Davies, Dr. Borden and Mr. Tarte had had their say," continued Mr. Foster, "but there was not much from Mr. Laurier. In Ontario there was not one place where the premier had said a word in favor of the imperialistic sentiment being so forcibly illustrated in Canada today.

"In the British Isles there was a feeling that Britain was Britain because she was Britain the whole world over, because her kin beyond the sea were as loyal and becoming as powerful as their forefathers at home, and because in their triumphal march of progress the old land was side by side with coming out that 'united we stand, divided we fall.' Mr. Tarte would have Canada fight only her own battles. 'The sentiment was worthy of the man who uttered it. Every Canadian boy who had left his home and was sailing down the St. Lawrence, bound for a land of trial, of warfare, of blood and maybe a glorious death, knew that if British power were swept from the cesan and British strength impaired. Canada's security was gone, and she the nations that today were following every detail of the present struggle, cryious of Britain's power and might and unity. "Let it be known by those powers as a salutary lesson that the very moment the brute of war was turned lccse Canada was ready to fight the battle of England, let it be known that every dependency of England is as ready to fight for her as the residents of England, Ireland and Scotland." The meeting closed with cheers for the Queen, Sir Charles Tupper, the chairman and the Canadian contin-

ON TO QUEBEC.

The Railway Journey of the New Brunswick Volunteers, told by One of Themselves While the Incidents Were Fresh in His Mind.

(From the Sun's Special Correspond-

That part of the above fraternity whose homes and affections are located in and about Canada's Winter Port. arrived safely at Point Levis late on the afternoon of Oct. 27th, and with frowsy looking heads thrust out of the right side of the car windows, gazed across the St. Lawrence, and up to the frowning fortress city, whose grey buildings rose tier above tier, ancient and modern, domed with tower, and spire, and higher still to the cannongirt citadel, where British power asserted itself on that memorable autumn day long years ago.

They rized and commented; then nudging each other, expressed their wish that those rugged heights were held by hostile Boers. Somebody suggested that this was deserving of three cheers. It was unnecessary to discuss the advisability of putting this matter to vote; so three rapid cheers in rapid time were discharged into the Quebec air, shortly followed by a tiger. So much for the general spirits and temperament of the troops at this, the conclusion of the first stage of their tourney. Our entire route had lain thus far through a country whose citizens had manifested their loyalty and intense enthusiasm over the volunteers by blazing bonfires, suppers, music and hearty farewells at nearly every town and village through which the special passed. Good fellowship prevailed upon the train. Pipes came forth, tobacco at its heels, and through shifting banks of blue smoke, yarns Report That the Senate Will Reinstate were exchanged, songs were bellowed out and anecdotes related. Magazines and papers of a respectable age filled a box that stood in one of the rear cars, and this was eagerly sought out and its contents criticized. An old Munsey was picked up by a colossal volunteer, clad in the blue of the artillery. He was, or rather had been smeking, using for that luxury a curly briar pipe, but the tobacco in its bowl had been allowed to grow cold, and a grey crust of ashes now crowned what was left of the weed unsmoked. Something in the journal caught his earnest attention, he bent lower over the printed page, and presently inserting a forefinger under the corner of the page, turned it over. A full length picture of Paul Kruger, in broadcloth and silk hat, sitting in front of his own Transvaal home, with his own corpulent legs crossed one over the other, and an expression on his furrowed countenance of mild satisfaction, greeted this volunteer's view. Something in the famous Boer's attitude did not seem to please the artilleryman, for in a trice the sheet had been plucked from the book, next instant twisted into a light, which transformed the smouldering tobacco into a glowing coal, while a cloud of fragrant smoke rose upward, and the previous picture of the Boer president became now a quivering fragment of cinder, which

Crossing from Point Levis, we landed at Quebec, and, headed by the Garrison band, marched to our quarters in the government immigration buildings, where we laid down the greatcoats and haversacks upon our respective beds (straw-filled mattresses) and then clumped merrily out on the verandah for supper. A descendant of the pioneers of La Belle France, aided by skilful helpers, catered to our appetites. And what appetites those were! With what roaring cheers and greeted, and, upon its disappearance, abrupt demands for more! The Frenchmen were kept busy; that goes without saying. They hustled-ran-leaped. been made for the field secretary next They were jumping Frenchmen indeed They were jumping Frenchmen indeed and agile as closely pursued fleas, and full of activity withal.

We mixed with the volunteers from Upper Canada and Quebec, silently took their measure, at the same moment loudly proclaiming eternal friendship, and confusion to Oom Paul and his legions. Then hearing the warning "lights ant" we sank Clementina left here this morning for the warning, "lights out," we sank down on our beds, and wrapping the blankets about us, joined in the vast chorus of uneasy snores that soon began to resound throughout the build-CO.
