DESPERATE DEED OF INTOXICATED POLICEMAN.

When Refused Permission to Go On Duty He Put Three Bullets Into His Chief and Then Attempted Suicide.

North Adams, Mass., Dec. 17.—Enraged at the refusal of his chief to immediately restore him to duty from which he had been temporarily suspended for intoxication, Police Officer Gardner Northup to-night shot Chief of Police William F. Dinneen. One bullet entered Dinneen's mouth, lodging in the neck, a second grazed the abdomen and a third passed through his right hand. His condition is critical. Overpowered as he attempted to fire again Northup turned the weapon upon himself and received a slight laceration on the forehead. After being locked up he slashed his throat with a jackknife, but will recover.

The shooting occurred shortly after 6 o'clock in the police station. Northup was to go on duty at 6 o'clock but it was found that he was intoxicated. He was refused permission to go on duty and was locked up. He then attempted to commit suicide by shooting himself.

PANAMA JOB ATTACKED
IN U. S. SENATE.

Washington, Dec. 17.—The senate was the scene of a most important debate on the isthmian canal question as affected by the president's recognition of the independence of Panama. The debate began by a speech by Mr. Hearst on his resolution of inquiry and lasted several hours.

In addition to Mr. Hearst's address there were speeches by Mr. Cushman and Mr. Foraker. All three were notable utterances and of historical interest.

Mr. Hearst continued his remarks to his resolution and they were generally well received and read from manuscript. He held that this country had not yet received full official information concerning the isthmian revolution and criticized in sharp terms the conduct of this country as shown by what had been given out.

There was no reservation in Mr. Gorman's speech. He practically wrote that the situation in Panama had changed to make a campaign issue and charged Assistant Secretary of State Loomis with a violation of the proprieties in discussing the question at a banquet in New York. He also said that unless further light was thrown on the subject he would oppose the Panama treaty.

He also referred to the impetuous action of the executive and declared that the senate should prevent the jeopardizing of the business interests of the country.

Mr. Foraker took Mr. Hearst to task severely for his remarks reflecting on the administration and his indiscretion in speaking in open session concerning executive matters. He defended the administration for its attitude toward the Panama revolt.

A heated colloquy took place between Mr. Foraker and Mr. Hearst during an effort of the Massachusetts senator to explain more fully his position in the matter.

A Christmas Eve Surrender.
By Margaret A. Richards.

'You seem to fit well into your niche,' I said, laughing, though I inwardly shrugged my shoulders. This country life was so different from what my sister had been accustomed to, and I wonder if she was really happy.

I remembered, as I sat on a stool beside her, and leaned on her knee, that the blue gingham apron she wore, and on which my hand then rested, would have been an object of ridicule to her in those old days. But, though her dress was different, and though her life was very unlike it used to be, her heart was as loving as of old, and she rejoiced to have me with her for the holidays.

'Just think,' she said, caressing my hair as tenderly as my mother might have done had she lived to know me, 'it is two years since I have seen you! I was married two years ago to-night, you know, on Christmas eve!'

'Yes,' I answered, 'and how unkind of you! You should have waited until, at least, the day after Christmas, for my sake. That was the latest 25th of December I ever spent!'

'And you have punished me for it,' she laughed, 'by staying away from me all this time. Well, I have had some lonely days, too, since then, so we can sympathize with each other.'

'You have been lonely?' I asked, looking at her quickly. 'Was she, as I had half guessed, unhappy in this quiet country home, and did she often think longingly of the life of gaiety she had known in the city?'

'What a question!' she exclaimed. 'Why, child, did you think my marriage would make me over again? The human heart must needs long for the loved one who is absent. When Jack goes to his farm across the river, and I am all alone saving for Aunt Hilda, then, of course, I think of you, and wish you were with me. You, with your duties in the college, are too busy, I suppose, to give much thought to me.'

'Do not say that,' I protested. 'Do you not receive evidence once a week of my remembrance?'

'Yes,' she replied, 'and your letters! Dear, they are gems. You do not know how much we enjoy them—Jack and Robert and I.'

'Robert!' I exclaimed. 'Surely that gentleman does not condescend to notice my letters?'

'You do him wrong, Carrie. He is reserved, it is true, but is goodness itself!'

'He thinks too much of himself,' I insisted, loftily. 'He sometimes takes me to task as if I were his little sister, and I am so! He is intimated to me only to day that I should have spent the Summer vacation with you, when I felt the need of a course at the summer school, and of course, grandmother had to be given the remainder of my time. Last Christmas I would have come, you know, but Jack's mother was sick, and you had to be there.'

'Yes,' she answered. 'And after a moment of silence she went on: "We decided then that Mrs. Morrell's death the home-stead must go to Robert. Though the youngest of the boys, he has taken care of his mother, and kept the old place up."'

'He ought to have done it,' I declared.

'Yes,' my sister agreed, 'but he deserves credit for the way in which he has done it. There are ways and ways of doing things, you know. Then Robert sacrificed his last year at college because his mother had grown so feeble, and he wanted to take the care of her himself.'

'I am highly commendable,' I said, nodding.

'You are so provoking, Carrie. You know that Robert loves you, and has loved you ever since Jack brought him to see us, when you were still in short skirts.'

'Indeed!' I exclaimed, arching my eyebrows. 'Has he ever said so?'

'What would he say?' my sister queried.

'None,' I answered, innocently.

For some moments we sat in silence before the fire, which was the only light we had in the room, and whose ruddy glow lighted up the furthest corner. And then I looked straight into the eyes above me, and urged: 'Tell me truly, can a girl who was raised in the city be happy as a farmer's wife?'

'I am happy,' she said, simply. 'Then, after a pause, she continued: "The life of the country is different from that of the city, and the work in a country home quite different from that of a city home. We have to become accustomed to these differences, of course, and must do so gradually. There were some things that seemed quite strange to me at first, and some duties I thought I could never do well. But I do like now, and Jack's mother says I was born for the country. Even if Jack could like city life, I would now prefer to stay here."'

'It is cozy, in truth,' I responded, 'but how different! And your dress—you used to affect long, clinging skirts, with flimsy lace about the bodice. Now you dress so plainly. Is it because you want to—because Jack is generous with his money?'

'I am sensible now,' was the answer. 'I have my garden, my chickens, my flower yard, as well as other outdoor duties to attend to. Long skirts and flimsy lace do very well for the house, outdoors they are in the way. But they are simply compensated for, she laughed, in the interest that I feel in all that pertains to my husband. I have every foot of ground as plain, every little quaking plant, every growing twig, every quaking chick. Bird song was my favorite study at school years ago. I study it now from nature rather than books, and like it even better than I used to.'

She would have spoken further, I suppose, only that at that moment we heard steps on the piazza, and Jack and Robert came in. They were loaded down with parcels, and Jack, when he had kissed us, expressed regret at having had to stay out until after dark. The sisters were so crowded, he said, that they could not get waited on early in the afternoon, and everywhere they went was delay after delay until it seemed they would never get through.

Sister declared she did not mind, since I was with her, and Hilda, too, was on the place.

Package after package was opened, and we examined the gifts. Jack and Robert had brought for their respective "hands," and laughed to see their efforts to keep certain packages hid from our curious eyes. Presently Robert handed a package over to sister, saying: 'Here, Mary, Jack was busy, and it devolved upon me to purchase the shoes he was to get for you. I don't know anything about buying shoes for her, but these are suggestive of you, and I got them because they seemed such as you should have.'

'Let's see what kind of shoes are suggestive of you,' I laughed, and began to untie the string. Soon it was untied, the paper taken off, and the box opened, when I saw there was exposed to our view a pair of cheap ugly brogues, several times too large for my sister. They had laughed, but I was indignant, and, before any could prevent, I had snatched the brogues from the box and thrown them into the fire, back of the burning logs.

Robert tried to speak, but I interrupted him: 'How dare you insult my sister? Is she no better than a servant that you should bring her such things, and expect her to wear them? She had all that was dainty and beautiful before her marriage!'

Sister put a hand over my lips, and silenced me as she said, gently: 'Hush, hush, hush!'

Just then on Hilda came into the room, a look of perplexity on her black, wrinkled face.

'These ain't lak de shoes I allers gits, Mrs. Jack. Dat clark dere sho ah giv you a wrong bundle, en I ain't gwine dah dem new shoos ter wear on Crismus Day. But weel Ah! dese beauties! Fit fo' de queen we work!'

'Ah,' said Robert, rising, and taking them from her; 'it was I who made the mistake. These are your shoes, Mary, and Hilda's.'

'And Hilda's,' I finished for him, 'have turned to cinders.'

Then I bowed my head in sister's lap, and sobbed like a foolish child, weeping with copious tears the blue checked gingham apron. She and Jack sought to console me, but Robert came not near. Presently, I heard him in consultation with Hilda in the kitchen, and knew he was making good to her the loss I had occasioned. Preparation for supper called sister to the dining-room, Jack had to attend to some outdoor work, and are long I was left alone. Not for any length of time, however, for soon Robert returned, and, seating himself by the table, became absorbed in a newspaper, as if I were not near at all.

'I served myself right, I knew. I had never treated him as well as I had other men, and all because—because—yes, I acknowledged it to myself—at last—because my unruly heart had persisted in going out to sympathize with all others. I must apologize to him for that night's work, at least, and the sooner the better.'

'Robert,' I tried to say, but the sound died within me. Then I became angry—angry with myself that I could not speak, and angry with him because I had wronged him, and because he could but evermore despise me. With me anger could ever find expression, and I was no longer silent.

'Why do you not hold me?' I asked, sharply, from my lowly place on the stool.

'I help you,' he queried, putting down the paper and looking at me in surprise as if he had only then learned of my presence.

'Yes,' I answered. 'You know that I am sorry, and that I want to say so. Yes, I know. And he came and knelt on the rug beside me, "let my eyes, Hilda, and I know that I would forgive you anything."'

'I hope,' I murmured, 'there will be nothing to forgive after this.'

'Stivers—"Do you mean to say you didn't know me when we met yesterday?" Quince—"Of course I knew you. How could I have avoided you so delectively?"'
