Remorse had strangled grief in Moondyno's breast, or the agony of the girl, attered in this terrible reproach, would have almost killed him. Accursed she said, and he know that the control of the said, and he know that the control of the said.

The dogs followed him, tired and spiritless. The moon sank and the sun rose, and still the lonely man held his straight and aimless road,—across mountains and through ravines, until at last his consciousness was recalled as he recognized the valley in which he stood as one he had travelled two days before, on the way to the gold mine.

Stretching his exhausted body on a sheltered bank beside a stream, he fell finto a deep sleep that lasted many hours.

have almost killed him. Accursed she said, and he knew that the word was true.

He turned from the place, not toward the pass, but toward the mountains, and walked from the valley with an aimless purpose, and a heart filled with ashes.

For hours he held steadily on, heedless of direction. He marked no places—had no thoughts—only the one gnawing and consuming presence of the ruin he had wrought.

The deep followed him tired and dyne awoke with a complete and settled resolution.

There could be no doubt of the determination in his mind. He had struck the trail of the murderer.

There was no more indiscretion or hesitation in his manner. He settled down to the pursuit with a grim and terrible earnestness. His purpose was clear before him—to stop the devil he had its loose—to prevent the escape of the assasin—to save the people who had trusted and saved him.

He would not turn from this intent though the track led him to the prison gate of Fremanlle; and even there in the face of the guards, he would slay the tretch before he had betrayed the server.

Death is on the trail of every man; but

Death is on the trail of every man; but we have grown used to him, and heed him not. Crime and sin are following us—will surely find us out, and some day will open the cowl and show us the death's head. But more terrible than these Fales, because more physically real, is the knowledge ever present that a relentless human enemy is on our track. Through the silent passes of the hills, his heart a storm of fears and hopes, the sarregeant fled toward security. Every mite added to the light ahead. He rode wildly and without rest—rode all day and such a cry. Again—God! how near and how keen it was—from the darkness,—a cry of mortal agony.

He fed and watered them, watching, with feverish eyes the renewal of their strength; and as he watched them eat, the wretched man fell into a sleep, from which he started in terror, fearful that the pursuer was upon him.

Through the day and night, depending on his great strength, Moondyne followed. While the fugitive rested, he strode on, and he knew by instinct and observation that he was gaining in the race.

Every hour the tracks were fresher. On the morning of the second day, he had found the sand still moist where the horses had drank from a stream. On the evening of that day he passed the burning embers of a fire. The murderer was an aiming confidence, and taking longer that the day came with a revelation.

He third day came with a revelation of the contract of the ing embers of a fire. The murderer was a fining confidence, and taking longer the third day came with a revelation to Moondyne. The sergeant had lost the way—had turned from the valley that life toward the Settlement, and had scaled his doom by choosing one that reached toward the Settlement, and had scaled his doom by choosing one that reached toward the immeasureable deserts of the interior.

The phrauer was not stayed by the discovery. To the prison or the wilderness, should the track lead, he would follow.

At first the new direction was pleasant. Dim woods on either side of a stream, the banks fringed with verdure and pranked with bright flowers. But like the pleasant ways of life, the tempting valley led to the desolate plains; before night had closed, pursuer and pursued were far from the hills and streams, it the midst of a trecless sea of sand.

Nothing but fear of death could drive the sergeant forward. He was bushman enough to know the danger of being lost on the plains. But he dare not return to meet him whom he knew was hunting him down.

There was but one chance before him, and this was to tire out the pursuer—if, as his heart suggested, there was only one in pursuit—to lead him farther and farther into the desort, till he fell on the barren track and died.

into a deep sleep that lasted many hours.

He awoke with a start, as it a voice had called him. In an instant his brow was set and his mind determined. He glanced at the sun to settle his direction, and then walked slowly across the valley, intently observing the ground. Before he had taken a hundred paces he stopped suddenly, turned at right angles down the valley, and strode on with a purpose, that though rapidly, almost in stantaneously formed, had evidently taken full possession of his will.

Sometimes persons of keen sensibility lie down to sleep with a trouble on the mind, and an unsettled purpose, and wake in the night to find the brain clear and the problem solved. From this was not a new found a small scrub to moisten his throat and lips.

But today, he thought, he must come face to face with the villain, and would kill him like a wild beast on the desert; and the torght upheld him.

His head was bare and his body nearly nearly and the torght upheld him.

His head was bare and his body nearly and the torght upheld him.

His head was bare and his body nearly and the day appeared and the valley, and strode on with a purpose, that though rapidly, almost in strange how pleasant, how like a dream, part of that day appeared. Sometimes he seemed to be awake, and bo know that he was moving over the and, and with a dread purpose; but at these times he knew that the trail had disappeared—that he was blindly going toward, lost in the wilderness. Toward the anad dispelled in the was more over the and the problem solved. From this was of unconscious early and the was more one to need rest.
