

concentrates than by growing the characteristic money crop of the district. Two purposes are served, the land grows its best economic crop and opportunity is afforded of buying the most suitable feeds for producing milk.

The question of the supply of pasture has been fully dealt with in a previous chapter and merits repetition only to emphasize the importance of including in a crop rotation some form of supplemental pasture that makes possible the continuance of good grazing in the hot summer months with its accompaniment of labor conservation in the rush season.