A Peculiar Plant. "Plants and animals," says Science, "both have developed spines as a means of protection against their enemies, but it is rare indeed to find a plant with spines below ground. The all too common sawbrier of the Southern States and Mexico is one of the few plants thus provided. The stems above ground are spiny to keep off graxing animals, but the underground starchy tubers are armored densely with spines apparently developed as a protection against peccaries—the wild pign still found in the southwest. The sawbrier is now bepond the original range of the wild pigs, but its underground armor comes into use as a protection against the domesticated hog of the old world."
