What a Child Learns.

By RUTH CAMERON.

RUTH CAMERON.

Did you ever think how much is crowded into the first five or six years of a child's life?

In five years (counting out the first), the average child, in addition to growing faster than at any other period, learns to speak, to understand, to read, to write, to stand, to walk, to feed himself, to dress himself and probably to read, besides hundreds of incidental lessons. If we kept on living at this rate through the allotted four score years and ten, what a lot we would come to know!

The Hardest Lesson Of All.

The child also begins to learn the lesson of his social relationships with the world of other people, represented by the present chiefly by his family. In some ways, this lesson is bigger and more perplexing than all the rest, surely should be made as simple and clear as possible. We should be careful never to complicate it by treating him unjustly or unreasonably. And yet how seldom any such ideal is held by the grown-ups in whose company this little foreigner is trying to orientate himself.

Consider some of the puzzling and settling difficulties a child has to do with in an average home. One parent forbids him to do a thing and the other permits him. He is merely reproved for transgressing some law which is really fundamental, such as treating an animal cruelly, and is violently punished for something which is only on the borderland between the accidental and the careless, such as spilling his bowl of milk at the table. To be sure, the latter causes his mother more trouble, but should our inconvenience or the child's wrong intent be the criterion of the severity of a punishment?

First Laughed At, Then Scolded.

He is laughed at for saying something funny and scolded without due explanation when he tries to arouse laughter by repeating it. If he has unreasonable fears, instead of having them intelligently explained away, they are often used as a means of scaring him into obedience.

If he is naturally without fear he frequently has fears instilled into him to keep him from doing this or that.

He hears the secret things of his heart which he has been foolish enough to confide to his grown-up friends blazoned abroad and perhaps laughed at.

People Who Think It Is Funny To Lie To A Child.

The many lessons which he must learn about life are confused and complicated by the misinformation which people give him in answer to his questions, either carelessly or in the idea that they are thereby showing an exquisite wit.

He is spoken to in high pitched irritable tones by the grown-ups whose nerves he has disturbed, and then scolded for responding to the nervous atmosphere by what these same people have the effrontery to call crossness.

Of course children are a great deal of trouble and it is easier to treat them carelessly than thoughtfully. But if you invited a guest to your house you would do your best to treat him courteously and fairly, wouldn't you? And what are children?

Lieut. Herder Invalided.

Mr. W. J. Herder is in receipt of a cable from his son, Lieut. Arthur Herder, formerly of the 2nd Battalion, Canadian Expeditionary Force, and now of the No. 4 Company 8th Battalion, stating that he had been invalided from the front and is now in hospital in London. Lieut. Herder has been in the trenches for upwards of three months, and is suffering from the effects of an old hurt received while playing football during his school days, and which has now come against him. He was to be operated upon yesterday.

GOOD-BYE TO THE SERGEANT.

Doherty was drilling with his squad of recruits in London. Doherty was nearly 6 feet 2 inches in height, and at that time the sergeant-major was a man whose height was only 5 feet 4 inches. On this day he approached the squad looking sharply about him for some fault to find.

All the men squared up except Doherty, and the sergeant-major at once accosted him. "Head up there, man!" called he. Doherty raised his head slightly.

"Up higher, sir!" The head was raised again. Then the sergeant-major managed by standing on his toes to reach Doherty's chin, and he poked it higher, with the remark: "That's better. Don't let me see your head down again."

By this time everybody was interested at seeing Doherty staring away above the sergeant-major's head, when a voice from above said, in a rich brogue: "Am I to be always like this, sergeant-major?"

"Then I'll say good-bye to ye, sergeant-major, for I'll never see ye again."
