It would appear that General Lord Methuen's forces were led into a trap at Magerstoniem, just as General Gazacre's troops were at Stormberg. It now turns out, according to the statement of the correspondent of The London Standard, that the Boers were prepared for the approach of the column. The British were totally unprepared for the surprise when they came upon the Boer trenches, and had not even fixed bayonets. It is said that had the brigade been extended, with bayonets fixed, the trenches might have been successfully rushed with far less sacrifice of life.

The Boers supply the information that during Gatacre's repulse at Stormberg the 2nd Royal Irish lost 10 killed and 32 wounded; the 1st East Lacashines, one wounded; the 2nd Northumberlands, 12 killed and 27 wounded. All the wounded men are prisoners in the hands of the Boers.

The Cape Town correspondent of The London Daliy News says Gen. Gatacre's repulse and Gen. Methuen's check north of Modder River have a most depressing effect upon the Cape Colony loyalists, who are by no means a growing body. Dutch disaffection in the colony is rapidly growing, and it would need but little persuasion to make the Dutch Join the Boers. The Daily Chronicle's Modder River despatch, which is at variance with all the other reports, represents Lord Methuen's forces as retiring Tuesday on the camp at Modder River as the result of renewed artillery firing that day. Several wounded Boers were taken to the British hospital. The scene on the hill and the immediate neighborhood of the Boer trenches showed dead bodies all about. One wounded Boer informed a correspondent of the Associated Press that their loss was terrible. The whole Scandinavian contingent was destroyed. Judging from information gleamed from the Boer wounded and prisoners taken in different parts of the field, the Boer losses must exceed 700. The destruction wrought by the naval guns was enormous.
