MR. WELLS AND THE DAYS TO COME

Mr. H. G. Wells, in his interesting story now appearing in the Pall Mall Magazine, London, gives glimpses of the days to come and the world to be. Here is some of his philosophy.

He is speaking of the British Empire, which he says was "far more pacific than the other more spirited and aggressive Powers." It "had given these Subject races cigarettes, boots, bowler hats, cricket, race machines, cheap revolvers, petroleum, the factory system of industry, halfpenny newspapers in both English and the vernacular, inexpensive university degrees, motor-bicycles and electric trams; it had produced a considerable literature expressing contempt of the Subject Races, and rendered it freely accessible to them, and it had been content to believe that nothing would result from these stimulants because somebody once wrote the 'Immemorial East'; and also, in the inspired words of Kipling—

"East is east and west is west,
And never the twain shall meet."

WAKING PEOPLE

"Instead of which, Egypt, India, and the subject countries generally had produced new generations in a state of passionate indignation and the utmost energy, activity and modernity. The governing class in Great Britain was slowly adapting itself to a new conception of the Subject Races as waking peoples, and finding its efforts to keep the Empire together under these strains and changing ideas greatly impeded by the entirely sporting spirit with which Bert Smallwax at home (by the million) cast his vote, and by the tendency of his more highly colored equivalents to be disrespectful to irascible officials. They would not go to the wars with France on account of them. Such a war would necessarily result in a European coalition against Germany. Our adversaries have long waited for an opportunity to form such a coalition. There is not a statesman in Germany who would make our interests in Morocco the ground for an appeal to arms, but Reichstag would vote a war fund to be raised for the sake of fighting the French in Morocco; no German would be ready cheerfully to send his son on a campaign in the defence of German interests there."

"What would be likely to happen if we attempted to enter into a dispute with France on the subject of Morocco, and if France, supported by Spain, Italy, and Russia, should refuse to grant our demands? The result would not be a war. Would any one wish to prevent such a struggle by a second edition of the Algeiras Conference? May good fortune inspire us such a thing as that? It would turn out ill for our prestige, considering the present grouping of the European Powers."

A DEFENSE OF NICOLAS II.

Enough has been written in detraction of Nicholas II. and his advisers to make it something to be said on the other side. People generally have a very false and imperfect idea of the Russian Emperor. They speak of him as a "mysterious and odious power," such as it has long ceased to be. For if by Charles we mean a ruler who regularly employs cannon in the course of his business, occasionally in curious fashions.

Thus, in the most advanced nations, making plants in the United States, "mud-guns" are fired at blast furnaces. Where the tipping holes are, the furnaces have been employed, man cannot approach to close them.

"Cannon-shaped tools, each manned by a crew of four or five, are therefore stationed opposite to the holes; they have been hydraulically charged with five-clap balls for projectiles, they are directed towards the holes, the five-clap balls bury themselves in the aperture until it is effectually filled up.

"Safe manufacturers use artillery extensively. Many of their standard pieces are tested by being subjected to the same conditions as the real thing, and a special strong room is being constructed in their material is dealt with in the same manner as the sides of an armor-plate.

One huge safe built lately was placed 200 feet from a six-inch naval gun, which propelled a nickel steel shell, weighing nearly one cwt., against it. In this instance, though the shell was driven into little pieces, it was difficult even for experts to identify the spot where it had struck the safe.

ARTILLERY VS. EARTHQUAKES

It is not easy to imagine what use the old trade war has for anything in the shape of cannon, but some of the latest oil pits lines are simply enormous rifles, many miles long, and especially in the crude condition, move too slowly to suit the purposes of their producers, whilst to pump it is expensive. However, it has been discovered that if the pipe is filled after the fashion of modern artillery, and a small portion of water added to the oil, the whole whirled along at great speed, the centrifugal motion throwing the water, which is heavier than the oil, to the outside edges, so that the oil flows freely through what is in effect, a water-lined pipe.

Probably the most curious manner in which cannon are employed is in connection with earthquakes.

Such disturbances occasionally give rise to earth fissures, of which it may be desirable to ascertain the depth; whilst it may also be necessary to get them to close again without delay.

IMPASSIBLE GORGES

But these gorges cannot always be approached with impunity. Artillery accordingly is fired into them when the resulting explosions give some idea of the dimensions of the chasm, whilst the shock sometimes assists in filling up the opening.

NEW VERSION OF THE INSCRIPTION OF DARIUS

Seventy years ago a young English officer of the East India Company's service was stationed at Kermanshah, in Western Persia. He had a fondness for Oriental literature, and employed his leisure in copying the strange cuneiform inscriptions on the face of the neighboring cliff of Behistun. Working alone, he deciphered many of the signs of the old Persian script, and his work was subsequently confirmed by the labors of Grotefend and Lassen, in Europe.

Rawlinson, at the risk of his life, succeeded in copying all the trilingual text, and gave to students a long text that has been known ever since. But the paper impressions taken by Rawlinson in 1847, now exhibited in the Babylonian Room of the British Museum, are old and torn, and not suited to supply a new version of this important inscription. So the Trustees of the British Museum decided to have a new and careful copy made, and the work was entrusted to Mr. L. W. King, F.R.S., of that institution, who, in the spring of 1904, commenced his difficult task. He has been the publisher of a splendid edition of all three versions, Persian, Babylonian, and Aramaean, or so-called Median, with full translations and commentary.

A PERILOUS TASK.

The study of Assyriology is no longer a hobby of the few; it has established itself in the curriculum of the great universities. But the paper impressions taken by Rawlinson in 1847, now exhibited in the Babylonian Room of the British Museum, are old and torn, and not suited to supply a new version of this important inscription. So the Trustees of the British Museum decided to have a new and careful copy made, and the work was entrusted to Mr. L. W. King, F.R.S., of that institution, who, in the spring of 1904, commenced his difficult task. He has been the publisher of a splendid edition of all three versions, Persian, Babylonian, and Aramaean, or so-called Median, with full translations and commentary.

It was no easy undertaking; the cliff had to be by the face of the cliff, over two hundred feet, in a cradle. Every line was copied, and presents many variations. The most important result has been the accurate copy of the Aramaean, or Susianian, or so-called Median, which was the father of Assyriology. The trustees of the British Museum are to be congratulated on the preparation of so monumental a work.

CAUSE OF REVOLT.

The inscription was cut by order of Darius Hystaspes, in probably the eighth year of his reign, which commenced B. C. 522, and is described with great detail the terrible state of the Persian Empire when Darius came to the throne. Babylonian and Aramaean, or so-called Median, with full translations and commentary.

BRIDGES MADE BY GUN FIRE.

Peace not only has its victories as well as war, but sometimes employs artillery to win them. Certain maps must be spurned a motor is placed on one bank and from it a projectile is fired, which carries a cord to the opposite side. This cord serves to draw across a thicker one, and so on, until a regular cableway is established to convey materials and workmen.

The great bridge over the Zambezi at Victoria Falls, was begun in this way, as were also those spanning the Andes and the tremendous canyons on the Denver and Rio Grande line.

Shooting for sulphur is amongst the strangest forms of mining. It is practiced within the immense crater of Algeiras, Caucasus, where the product gathers in great bunches in inaccessible positions, and is brought down by being fired.

It may be added that engineers now and then find their contrivances turned into unexpected artillery. This occurred in India where telegraph poles used to be fixed in iron sockets.

These sockets have been used by hostile nations as cannon, the bolt hole at the butt sufficing as a touch hole and the telegraph wire being cut up into a kind of shrapnel capable of causing ghastly wounds.

One of the oldest methods of utilizing artillery occurs in cases of drought. Theorists have pointed out that great artillery duels in warfare have frequently been followed in heavy rain, and it is not the first time that gun fire has been used to bring a spell of dry weather to a close in order to save the crops.

SUNDIALS THAT STRIKE

The rich man's garden is generally ornamented with a sundial, which, as the sun moves, tells the time of day. In the future a new toy may take its place—namely, dial, not silently, but by striking the sundial which will tell the time of hours like a clock. This "voiced" sundial is a real sun-machine, not a piece of clockwork trickery.

On the dial, the hours are cut as silts and underneath each silt is a piece of selenium—that curious new substance which has made telegraphic photography possible. The peculiarity of selenium is that when a ray of light falls on it, it allows a current of electricity to pass more readily than when it is in shadow. Hence, the silts hourglasses, then is a segment of selenium connected with an electric battery through an instrument called a differential contact galvanometer, and then with a suitably-adjusted electric bell. When the shadow falls across the hour-silt the modified current rings the bell, and thus audibly tells the hour.

The new toy will soon be on the market, but its cost will be considerable, and it won't work on cloudy days; so its purchasers will be wise not to sell their watches in a hurry.

A SACRIFICE TO SCIENCE.

A holy young chemist, whilst mixing a compound of stuff, dropped a match in a vial, and after a while they found his front teeth and one cuff.

"I want to make a gift to Miss Passey," said Dumfries, "I wonder what sort of animal she's prefer for a pet?" "A man," promptly suggested Miss Knox.
