Will Science Reanimate the Dead ?

The human frame has been dissected and its mechanism discovered. The various functions of its several parts are understood, and their working easily imitated. The action of the lungs, the circulation of the blood, and other pheomena of life appear to be simple processes. The scientist, seeing that these phenomena accompany life and are esential to its existence, inquires whether life may not be produced by these visibie causes of its continuance. What is ause and what effect? is the question that haunts him. The scientific mind was once almost it does not approve of. In its second issue ter. wholly bent upon the discovery of the after our account of the indignation meetart of transmuting the baser into the ing held by the teachers last Saturday, covering the secret they spent their lives in bending over the crucible and vainly trying to discover and imitate the processes by which nature works. They grew so haggard and withered in the earch that the popular opinion of their mmunings with the powers of darkess was justified so far as may be by appearances.

The scientific dream of the present day is the reanimation of the dead before corruption has done its destroying work. If life is extinguished by stopping the action of the lungs-preventing breathing-why may it not be rekindled by artificially setting the lungs again in of an applicant for promotion-"Th's can notion?
