An Attack on Napoleon.

On the 24th of February, M. Thiers, the French historian, made a speech in the French Lorentz of the States of the French Lorentz of the French Lorentz of the French Lorentz of the French Lorentz of the States of the It has always been understood that the Constitution could be modified by the Emperor and the Senate. The memorable declaration of January 14, 1852, that liberty was to crown the edifice, and the great decree of November 24, which revived political discussion, encouraged the nation to believe that institutions which the civilized world believes alone capable of assuring liberty and security, and which France was the first to give to the world and is therefore naturally impatient to see restored to herself, would not long be withheld. Unitil latterly the re-establishment of this liberty seemed to be only a question of time, but now it appears to be made one of principle. Last year and this year the speech from the throne represented liberal institutions as likely to weaken power, to hamper its initiative, and to replace it under the yoke of assemblies." M. Thiers continued in grave and somewhat unguarded, but still unmistable language, to speak of what he called the "necessity" of liberty of speech and of the press and freedom of elections.
