Lad Crushed by Elevator Directs His Rescuers.

Caught Between Car Floor and Ceiling, for an Hour and Half He Stolidly Watches Efforts to Release Him—Loses Both Legs but May Recover—Sends for Police, Firemen and a Priest.

Hundreds of stenographers and clerks were leaving the offices in the fourteen story building at Nos. 82 to 92 Beaver Street, at 5 o'clock last evening when Joseph Dinsgebacher, fifteen, the only passenger in an ascending elevator, started to leave the car at the fifth floor, where he was employed to run errands. One foot was out of the elevator, when it suddenly shot upward. The other dropped out, and as the car passed upward the small of his back hit the sill of the car and his body went backward into it.

Both legs were dragged along between the grill steel work of the shaft and the cage until the ceiling of the sixth story was reached, and there the elevator stopped, crushing the upper parts of his legs between the floor of the cage and the ceiling. Joseph did not scream, but the shouts of Joseph Raddigan, the elevator attendant, quickly caused a commotion in the building. The fifth and sixth floors about the row of elevator shafts soon were packed, and many young women screamed and became hysterical because it seemed nothing could be done to relieve the boy.

First Calls the Police.

"Get a cop! Get a cop!" cried Joseph, when he had calmly surveyed his predicament. Closely following Policeman Ehrhardt came the police rescuers from the Old Slip station. "Better get the firemen, I guess," said Joseph to Ehrhardt. "You can't lower the cage without crumpling up my pins and you can't raise it without cutting 'em off."

A telephone message called Hook and Ladder Truck Company No. 15 to the scene, but the firemen could do nothing. Then a special call was sent for Rescue Squad No. 1, and five minutes after those men versed in expediency arrived they had an acetylene torch rigged and were burning away the steel work of the elevator shaft, the cage floor and the lifting girder.

"Say, I'm a Catholic and I guess I'm in for life," spoke up Joseph, as the flaming steel sparks dropped about him. "I want to confession last Saturday, but I guess you better send for a priest. I punched another kid in the nose yesterday and I better get that off'n my conscience."

Policeman Hotter used the telephone and soon the Rev. Joseph Plunkett, of the Mission of Our Lady of the Rosary, No. 7 State Street, arrived and while the firemen burned away at the steel he administered the last rites of the Church to Joseph who said he felt somewhat better afterward.

Sparks from the acetylene torch dropped to the bottom of the shaft and set fire to oily waste there. The smoke was stifling when firemen ran a hose into the basement and extinguished the flames. Then a stream of water was kept running in the shaft to prevent other fires starting.

Hot Beam Adds to Danger.

"Gee, that's hot!" cried Joseph, when the acetylene torch had highly heated a steel beam it was cutting through and against which the lad's legs were crushed. Firemen then had to keep water playing on the beam. "Say, father, do I have to go to confession again for saying 'Gee?'"

"No, son, you meant no wrong."

"Well, I'm sorry for anything wrong I did, and maybe I shouldn't have punched that kid in the nose yesterday."

For an hour and a half a small army of men were ministering to the boy in one way and another. The police reserves were holding in order a great crowd that had gathered in Beaver Street, other policemen were guiding the stenographers and clerks out of the building by other elevators; Dr. Patitsky, of Volunteer Hospital, was holding his hand and occasionally rubbing a cocaine solution on the boy's legs to deaden the pain, and all that time Joseph never uttered a cry of pain or a word of complaint.

It was half-past six o'clock when half a ton of steel had been cut away and he was lifted out and carried, on a stretcher, to the ambulance in the street. The waiting crowd, that had heard of his stolidism, cheered him as he started for the Volunteer Hospital. There it was stated that one leg would have to be amputated at the hip and the other was broken in several places. He may recover. Joseph lives at No. 882 Forest Avenue, Ridgewood, Queens.—N. Y. Herald, May 11.

Chambers's Journal.

This old-established journal—it was founded in 1832—has achieved a reputation for providing sound reading matter, and manages to maintain its popularity without the aid of illustrations. The issue for April is exceptionally well edited, and, apart from serial fiction and short stories, there are several articles of considerable value. Joseph Mede furnishes the story of "A Builder of Empire: Samuel Marsden," who was a Methodist and also a priest of the Church of England, and over a hundred years ago held the first Christian service and delivered the first Christian message to the then heathen of New Zealand. D. W. O. Fagan, in an article on "Plagues of Fleas," relates his experience of a flea-plague forty years ago at a little coastal town not far from Dunedin, in the South Island, when the fleas were upon us—millions of them! You could hear them patter, patter, as they hopped by in armies. The ground seemed covered by a brown spray as they passed. . . . Dogs rolled in the dust and howled. Cats took to the bush, and were seen no more. The fleas invaded the houses. Floors and wall literally swarmed with them. They got into the food and every utensil. You ate fleas, willynilly, at your meals. Sleep was quite impossible. The town came within an ace of madness from protracted insomnia. But Providence intervened. The visitation lasted only three weeks. Night fell on the twenty-first day, and the town was one huge dolorous scratch. In the morning not a single flea remained. They had departed as suddenly as they had come.

That it is not always safe to ask questions of children while delivering the now customary address to boys and girls at the Sunday morning service is obvious from an experience which a friend of mine once had. He was speaking to them of the incident which relates how Joseph and Mary, having been warned, took the young child and fled into Egypt for fear of Herod. "I wonder," said the priest, "if any of you boys or girls can tell me why Joseph and Mary fled into Egypt?" "Because," said a thin, shrill voice, to the amazement of the people, "because they hadn't paid their rent!"—A Parson, in 'The Strand Magazine.'

A certain famous Admiral of the fleet, on being complimented on his superb health, smiled and said: "I attribute my good condition to plenty of exercise and no banquet. One-third of what we eat, you know, enables us to live." "In that case," said his friend jestingly, "what becomes of the other two-thirds?" "Oh," said the Admiral, "they enable the doctor to live."—The Windsor Magazine.
