"Oh my! Oh my!"
"Uncle Joe, at last,

later on that evening,
Uncle Joe
speaking of them politics, answered me "just so."

those who played the game,
ought to give us decent laws,

our interests they work-

all things are different,
partnership is rife,
public interests come first,
the public life.
National (?) Government they formed.
the war? they said,
the armistice was signed,
the healths were ruined instead.

Would I travel abroad for health
And leave my dear old country,
But leave not all her wealth?

"Not I," and Joe's eyes grew angry
And his lips together set.
And he belov'd, "Fishes of fury!
We're not finished with you yet.
You prate about your party,
You talk of what you've done."
But judgment draweth nearer,
Hear the sentence, "Not well done!"

"Elections coming in the fall,
Your day of doom draws near,
You had better stay away from home
Ere voters' wrath appear.
For in the day of voting,
Sickness doth not count,
And knighthoods will not save you
From paying your last account."

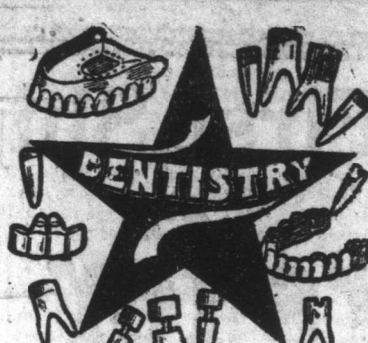

"Thus Nationalists tremble,
Be merry while you may,
In the days at your disposal
Make monetary hay.
For retribution cometh
And sentence over-due,
You'll hear the voters crying,
"We want no more of you."

The First Fight Between Ironclads.

The first fight between ironclads took place on February 16, 1862, between the "Virginia" and the "Monitor," two U.S. battleships, in the fight between North and South. After two hours of hard fighting the ironclads had been unable to make any impression on one another, and the commander of the "Virginia" therefore determined to ram his opponent, or to get alongside, grapple with her, and board her. The "Virginia's" steering-gear, however, was defective, and it was only after an hour's hard work that she drew alongside. Then it was found that the "Virginia" could not get enough headway to deal a decisive blow, for her funnel had been so riddled with shot that she could not get enough draught to keep her engines in motion. While at close quarters the "Monitor" fired two shots at the "Virginia," and so great was the concussion caused by the discharge that the crew of the after guns were knocked over, bleeding profusely from the nose and ears. The fight had now lasted four hours, and the "Monitor" having considered it proved that each ironclad was invulnerable to the other, withdrew. This remarkable contest was decisive in more ways than one. It wrested from the South their brief hopes of naval supremacy, while it gave a lesson to the Powers of the Old World by proving decisively that the days of the old wooden ships were numbered. Acting on this hint, they continued with renewed impetus the construction of ironclad vessels, the practical history of which may be said to date from the famous fight between the "Virginia" and the "Monitor."

As the Crow Flies.

The people of Watford Valley, West End, saw a very strange and unusual sight yesterday afternoon, when a flock of about 1,000 crows flew there, and alighted in a field by the river side. A large crowd had been fighting in the field with a hawk, and the two having clinched, both fell to the field and continued the fight. The rest of the crows dropped down to watch the battle, and the air was filled with the noise of their "cawing," while the field was literally black with moving crows. A man who was nearly got his rifle and shot the hawk, after which the crows took to flight and winged their way inland.
